"Swabian Stories" is a volume of verse by Theodore Tilton. Their general tenor is the ballad form, although the writer has certainly failed to reach the true spirit of that difficult style. The plots which he has verified are in many instances weak and undeserving of their setting. There is one poem, however, that is a gem in its way. It is entitled "The Chamois Hunter," and possesses a simplicity and charm that will cause it to survive the rest of the book. Published by R. Worthington, New York; for sale by the booksellers.

"A Modern Instance," by W. D. Howells, is attracting more attention than has any American novel for a number of years. It is said to be already in its twelfth thousand, and the publishers can scarcely supply the demand. Many of our readers are familiar with the story, it having run in serial form through the Century for a number of months. Those who have not read it in the magazine should secure the book, as it is destined to be one of the chief topics of conversation for some time to come. Published by James R. Osgood & Co.; for sale by Billings, Harbourn & Co.

Our Little Ones for 1882 appears in a bound form. It is edited by "Oliver Optic," and is, we believe, a successor to the once popular Nursery. The illustrations, which are numerous, are very well executed. The stories and poems are of the average merit. Published by Lee & Shepard, Boston; for sale by Drexel. We have received the November numbers of The Little Folks' Reader and The Pansy, and also the December number of Baby Land, all published by D. Lothrop, Boston. Numbers seven and eight of the Plymouth Pulpit, containing Rev. H. W. Beecher's two latest sermons, are just out. Published by Fords, Howard & Hulbert, New York; price, 7 cents each.

Miscellany: Mr. Henry Lucy, an English novelist, is said to have just received from a London publisher the largest sum ever paid for a first novel—at least in England. His story, entitled "Gideon Floyce," is a political one. Two hundred and fifty dollars is thought in London to be a good sum for a first novel. Mr. Justin McCarthy, who now commands an excellent price in the market, got one hundred and twenty-five dollars for one of his first books. An American firm has been known to pay for a short story by an unknown writer almost as much as Mr. Lucy has received for his long novel. George Rose, better known as Arthur Sketchev, has just died in London. He was an exceedingly humorous writer, and will be remembered for his Prown sketches, "Mrs. Brown at the Play" being one of the most amusing things we have ever read. There is a remarkable collection of one hundred and seventy editions of Horace in the library, about to be sold, of Doctor von Ritter, of Prague. The collection includes those editions published at Venice in 1505 and 1520, at Milan in 1512 and 1514, at Râle in 1527, at Padua in 1529, and in Paris in 1544. That Carlyle's philosophy was the outcome of a weak digestion is the declared opinion of an English medical journal. A saucy critic observes that it would be interesting to know how many lobsters over night would produce a philosophy next morning. It is stated that the work that has held its own most steadily among the thousands issued by the Riverside Press is "Uncle Tom's Cabin." It sells as readily to-day as when it was first published.

Announcements: Mr. Austin Dobson has written and Mr. Abbey has illustrated for Harper's Magazine a poem entitled "The Ladies of St. James." The poems which Mr. Ruskin wrote in his youth are soon to be reprinted in New York by John Wiley's Sons. They do not particularly add to his fame. All the more important notes appended to the late E. W. Lane's translation of the "Arabian Nights" have been gathered into a series of chapters forming a complete picture of Arabian Society in the Middle Ages and to-day. The volume will, in reality, be a sort of Moslem encyclopedia. Ouida has written a new story, entitled "Frescoes," the first portion of which will appear in Belgravia for January. The same number will contain the opening chapters of Justin McCarthy's new serial story, "Maid of Athens." Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe has written a serial story for the Youth's Companion. Richard Hengist Horne, now past his eightieth year, is about to publish a new work, together with a fourth edition of his "Cosmo de Medici." Some unpublished poems by Freiligrath are about to be brought out in Germany. Among them is a translation of Byron's "Mazeppa." Charles Reade's new volume, "Readiana," is a collection of the bright, shrewd, and racy comments on current events contributed by the author to the newspapers during the past few years. In this volume Reade shows himself more than ever a generous and eloquent advocate of all that is humane and noble. Robert Buchanan is becoming one of the most persistent workers in Britain. He sends forth book after book from his study, the last being a novel, with the promising title of "The New Abelard." The first volume in the forthcoming English series of "Eminent Women" is to be Miss Mathilde Blind's "George Eliot." It will give, for the first time, a faithful account of George Eliot's early life, and many details of her unknown literary labor, with much new and interesting correspondence. Scribner & Welford are about to republish a valuable volume on "Ancient Greek Female Costume." It will be illustrated by a series of one hundred and twelve full-page plates, and about thirty smaller illustrations, with explanatory letter-press and illustrative passages from Homer, Hesiod, Æschylus, Sophocles, Pindar, Herodotus, Lucian, Aristophanes, Xenophon, Theocritus, Plutarch, and Lucian. These have been selected and arranged by Mr. J. Moyer Smith,

TO HOUSEKEEPERS.

If you wish to use goods of full weight and absolute purity, see your grocer supplies you with

KINGSFORD'S

OSWEGO

STARCH.

ROYAL

BAKING

POWDER.

WALTER BAKER & CO.'S

CHOCOLATE.

SMITH

BROTHERS'

PACKAGE

BORAX.

WM. T. COLEMAN & CO.

AGENTS,

121 and 123 Market Street,

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

ATTRACTIONS!

Our selections for the coming Holidays are exceptionally fine, and embrace the largest assortment of articles pertaining to the DIAMOND, WATCH, JEWELRY, and SILVERWARE business to be found in the State, and we are selling at close prices. All goods are marked in plain figures, from which no deviation is made.

GEO. C. SHREVE & CO.

110 MONTGOMERY STREET.

CHRISTMAS

PRESENTS for all ages can be most satisfactorily selected from the immense and carefully selected stock of STANDARD BOOKS, FINE ART BOOKS, CHOICE GIFT BOOKS, JUVENILE BOOKS, BIBLE and PRAYER BOOKS, RUSSIA LEATHER GOODS, PHOTOGRAPH and AUTOGRAPH ALBUMS, DIARIES for 1883, GOLD PENS, ELEGANT STATIONERY, and a magnificent variety of CHRISTMAS and NEW YEAR CARDS at BANCROFT'S.

THE LATEST NOVELTIES

HOLIDAY GOODS

Are now to be found at

THOMAS DAY & CO'S,

122 AND 124 SUTTER STREET.

The Choicest Designs in GAS FIXTURES and RARE LAMPS are arriving daily.

PRANG'S PRIZE X-MAS CARDS.

A full assortment of Prang's Cards may now be found in the Art and Book Stores.

FINE BOOKS.

Just received from Europe a choice collection of STANDARD and ILLUSTRATED BOOKS, in fine bindings, for the HOLIDAYS, which I offer at very low prices. A call is respectfully solicited.

MAX H. FAY, AGENT, IMPORTER OF FINE BOOKS,
Rooms 14, 15, 16, Thurlow Block, 126 Kearny St.

TAKE THE ELEVATOR.

OPEN EVENINGS.

HOLIDAY-STYLE HATS

IN A LARGE VARIETY, AND A SPECIAL LINE OF

FINE CHILDREN'S GOODS,

JUST OPENED BY

C. HERRMANN & CO.

(GERRMANN, THE HATTER.)

336 KEARNY STREET, BETWEEN BUSH AND PINE STS.

OREGON IMPROVEMENT CO.

CUMBERLAND COAL,
LEHIGH LUMP and EGG COAL,
AT WHOLESALE.

SEATTLE COAL,

At Reduced Rates for Domestic and Steam Use.

MAIN OFFICE:

210 BATTERY STREET,
San Francisco.

DEPOTS:

Beale Street Wharf, San Francisco.
Foster's Wharf - - - Oakland.

MAGNESO-CALCITE

BOND AND NOTE CASES,

JEWEL CASES.

HOUSEHOLD CHESTS,

ABSOLUTELY FIRE-PROOF.

D. S. BROWN & CO.,

36 California Street.

S. P. COLLINS & CO.

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL
dealers in Old London Dock Brandy, Port Wine, Sherries, and all the choicest brands Champagne, Apple Jack, Pisco, Arrack, Cordons, etc. 225 MONTGOMERY, and 511 CALIFORNIA STREETS, S. F.

CALIFORNIA SUGAR REFINERY.

OFFICE, - - - 325 Market St.
WORKS, Eighth and Brannan Sts.
C. SPRECKELS, President,

J. D. SPRECKELS, Vice-President,
A. B. SPRECKELS, Secretary.

COMPOUND OXYGEN

NEW TREATMENT BY INHALATION, for Consumption, Asthma, Bronchitis, Dyspepsia, Catarrh, Headache, Debility, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, and all Chronic and Nervous Disorders. Prepared by DR. STARKEY & FALEY, Philadelphia, Pa. Packages contain all directions, and are easily sent by express, ready for USE AT HOME. H. E. MATHEWS, Forwarding Agent, 606 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Cal. Send for Free Pamphlets.

30 DAYS' TRIAL FREE.

We send free on 30 days trial Dr. Dye's Electro-Voltaic Belts and other Electric Appliances TO MEN suffering from Nervous Debility, Lost Vitality, and kindred troubles. Also, for Rheumatism, Liver and Kidney Troubles, and many other diseases. Speedy cures guaranteed. Illustrated pamphlets free. Address

VOLTAIC BELT CO., Marshall, Mich.

FITS

A Leading London Physician establishes an Office in New York for the Cure of EPILEPTIC FITS. From Am. Journal of Medicine.

Dr. Ab. Meserole (late of London), who makes a specialty of Epilepsy, has without doubt treated and cured more cases than any other living physician. His success has simply been astonishing; we have heard of cases of over 20 years' standing successfully cured by him. He has published a work on this disease, which he sends with a large bottle of his wonderful cure free to any sufferer who may send their express and P. O. Address. We advise any one wishing a cure to address Dr. AB. MESEROLE, No. 26 John St., New York.

CONSUMPTION.

I have a positive remedy for the above disease; by its use thousands of cases of the worst kind and of long standing have been cured. Indeed, extreme is my faith in its efficacy, that I will send TWO BOTTLES FREE, together with a VALUABLE TREATISE on this disease, to any sufferer. Give Express & P. O. Address. Dr. T. A. SLOCUM, 131 Pearl St., N. Y.

Hunyadi THE BEST AND CHEAPEST

LAXATIVE. János

"THE RICHEST OF NATURAL APERIENT WATERS."

Baron Liebig.

"SPEEDY, SURE, & GENTLE."

Dr. Roberts, Univ. Coll. Hosp.,
London, England.

Ordinary Dose, a Wineglassful before breakfast.
Of all Druggists and Mineral Water Dealers.

NONE GENUINE BUT WITH A BLUE LABEL.

FOR SALE BY

RUHL BROTHERS

522 Montgomery Street,

SAN FRANCISCO.

"Madam," quoth Jack the other morning, as I was, perhaps somewhat ostentatiously, assisting to induct him into his overcoat as he prepared to sally forth into a cold and cruel world to wrestle for his daily bread, "madam, you may as well speak your piece at once. What is it you want? Out with it. I am prepared for the worst."

"My dear Jack," I said, with my most innocent expression, "I haven't an idea what you mean."

"I could easily submit to a long siege of these delicate attentions and await the issue," he went on, as if he had not been interrupted, "but they always cease so suddenly when your end is accomplished, that I always feel like a man who has sat down involuntarily on the sidewalk, and I prefer the lighter shock immediately to the heavier one later."

"My dear Jack," I say, with freezing dignity, "I had thought that I fulfilled my wifely duties with due conscientiousness every morning."

"And so you do, my dear," says Jack, kindly, "but I allude to the number of little extras thrown in this morning. Everything that I wanted has lain magically under my hand. I always swear like a demon when I button my collar. It is the habit of my lifetime, but you stopped me at my second oath this morning and buttoned it with your own deft fingers. I have trodden no less than three times on the corns of your pet opinions, and you have not shrunk visibly. My eggs were poached to a turn, my coffee was a miracle; you read the newspaper to me, and you have intimated twice within sixty minutes that I have the bearing of an Apollo. Now, what do you want?"

"Nothing in the world, my dear fellow. That last was simply the expression of my own inner conviction, and I happened to mention it this morning of all mornings in the year. Good-bye, Jack. Come home early. Good-bye. Ah, by the way," I call, as he is half way down the steps, "the box-office for the Nilsson concert season opens this morning, and, if we are going, you might as well stop and get seats."

"Jack carefully retraced his steps, and seated himself on a hall chair."

"I had intended," he said, "to select a long evening for this discussion, and you have taken me unawares. The fact is, in these hard times I fear we can not afford the Nilsson season."

"I sat upon another hall chair, and regarded the new economist curiously."

"I wonder," I said, "how many husbands have made that remark this morning."

"Thousands," cried Jack, promptly. "The season is going to be a fizzle anyhow. The music is too high for the masses, and who will want to go at such a price?"

"My dear Jack," I retort; "the population of the world is something approximating to one billion, four hundred million. I can not remember the exact figure. Out of that number there are perhaps six women who sing superlatively well. Out of the six there are two who share the excelsior laurel, and one of these has come to San Francisco. Not to hear her would be to be willfully, blindly, besottedly foolish. The sum to be expended is actually paltry for the value rendered. The whole town is on the qui vive, and we have all the pleasure of a keen anticipation which is new to us. It is a racy, vivid feeling, and I love it. So do you, and so do we all. Surely, a new sensation is cheap at four dollars a head. Then we have the concert themselves. It will be a beautiful scene—the lights, the toilettes, the mantling pleasure on every face, the music, the diva."

"Cut it, Betsy—the everything."

"Yes, the everything. Is it dear once in a way at four dollars a head? Then we have the memory of it all, the proud consciousness of being able to say that we did go when unending people shall ask us, and a theme of conversation for many months to come. Is not a fruitful theme cheap at so small an outlay? Pleasure is as necessary to mankind as food. The discreet expenditure of his income sets aside so much for pleasure as particularly as he sets aside so much for shoe-leather and so much for his tailor. And, talking of his tailor, what does so small a sum as twenty-eight dollars amount to. It will not buy so much as a coat for you, nor a mantle for me."

"My dear Betsy," spoke Jack, "your arguments have more weight than you think; principally because I had intended to give you the Nilsson tickets as a pleasant surprise. I shall now go down town quite convinced, and buy them strictly as a matter of economy."

"And he went. It was only nine o'clock of the morning, and he was a sleek, well-shaven, well-fed, well-dressed, prosperous-looking citizen."

About eleven o'clock, as I was walking down town, a string of weary-looking men ornamented the sidewalk along three or four blocks of Sutter Street. There was the low murmur of curses among them, like the growl of an incipient commune, and a chain-gang suggestion in the tired look of their eyes, in their dust-begrimed garments, and battered hats. One of the most disreputable looking hailed me familiarly.

"Great heavens, Jack!" I cried, as I suddenly recognized my Apollo of the morning; "what in the world are you doing here?"

"Keeping my place in the Nilsson line," he replied, grimly and tersely.

"And what is the matter with you and your clothes, and all about you. You look like a tramp, Jack?"

"Nothing," he murmured, plaintively; "only that I tried to get a little ahead in the line, and these fellows put me back."

"I glared savagely at 'these fellows,' and they returned the glare with interest. They looked like desperadoes of the blackest type, but on closer inspection they proved to be well-known and reputable citizens."

"I see Mr. Ferguson was up the line, nearly to 'Mont Street,' I said. 'Give me the money, Jack, I won't let him get the tickets.'"

"I tried that little game half an hour ago," murmured Jack, despondingly; "and that's what's the matter with my hat. These fellows wouldn't have it."

Again I glared at the fellows, but my glare had no paralyzing effect.

"This is absurd," I cried, indignantly; "every one knows that this sort of business is all carried on by telephone or message. I will send a D. T. boy, and settle the matter in a twinkling."

"Betsy, Betsy!" shrieked Jack, with a ring of agony in his voice, as I turned on my heel to walk off; "don't, for heaven's sake! I tried a D. T. boy. He was small, and young, and sharp, and slippery as an eel. But I fear that by this time he has been carried home to his mother, a mangled corpse. The mob set upon him when he reached the box-office, tore the boy and the note to fragments, demanded that the agent opened no notes, then transmitted their indignation along the line till it reached me, where it stopped and spent itself. I feel like a wreck, Betsy; what do I look like?"

"Dear Jack," I cried, remorsefully, "you have suffered enough; give it up. I don't care a button for the Nilsson season. Come home and rest, and get yourself put together again; and I will sing 'Grimes's Cellar-Door' to you, and you will swear that I am a nightingale, and we shall be happy."

"Never," cried Jack, fired by my spirit of sacrifice. "After such an instance of wifely devotion, never! I will stand here till the spring rains set in, if necessary, but we will hear Nilsson. In days of old it was the custom of a martyr's wife to stand by the rack and cheer him to the last. Come and visit me at intervals, Betsy, with any nice little thing in the way of fodder that may occur to you, and I will bear up bravely."

By four o'clock he had worked his way down to the market, where the cheerful oyster sustained his fainting spirit. By five, the jostling crowd of Kearny Street prodded him with their elbows; and at six he came up the steps he had gone down in the morning so smiling, joyous, and confident, a battered wreck, but triumphant.

Instead of putting him into ill-humor, the fatigues of the day seemed to have exhilarated him. "There is really nothing," he cried, "so enjoyable as overcoming a difficulty. This idea of making a man fight for the privilege of spending his money is a novel one in the history of amusements, and I like it. The Nilsson concert will be the very intoxication of pleasure to me, because it will have been such hard work to get there, and I got the very last tickets that were sold before the box-office closed."

"My dear Jack," I say, "I fancy I am dining with greater pleasure and comfort with you than if the man ahead of you had been the last man. Can you imagine the feelings of the string of patient creatures behind you who were too late?"

But the successful man, refused to look upon the shady side of the way. "I think perhaps they can run their own indignation," he said. "The fragments of conversation that reached my ears as I turned to seek the shelter of home are not in polite circulation. In fact, Betsy, some of their very pointed remarks would have knocked your theory of economy flat."

"Jack," I said, "it was perhaps rather as a matter of duty. But Jack's lifted eyebrow was so eloquent that I ceased to explain why I wanted to go."

"Apropos," he continued, "do you know that it is really a feeling of duty which takes me so often to see the ballet? I regard it as an institution which is not sufficiently appreciated for its artistic value. If we could take those corymbes and group them on the stage, unpainted, unpowdered, unwigged, and in their every-day habiliments, what a sight it would be! Yet here, notwithstanding a trifling disparity in legs, with a bit of blue tulle, a wisp of spangle, and a calcium light, they are transformed, and become things of beauty. Time out of mind the novelists have been writing of women superb with indignation and scorn, rising to their full height. As a matter of cold fact, no woman ever does rise to her full height, except a première danseuse. Cornalba, in her 'excelsior solo,' for that, like Rosalind, is more than common tall, is a superb sight, and yet I could wish," murmured Jack, speculatively, "to see a really beautiful woman in the dance."

"Perhaps the Langtry will take to the ballet for her next sensation. She can not be expected to jog along in the old way much longer, and I fancy she is a woman who will be fertile in ideas for keeping the interest alive." But it transpires that the romantic Jack wants a dark Italian beauty. "Is it a matter of duty, I ask, that you are waiting over for the fair, the inexpressive she in the dance?"

"Yes," he said, "I wish to applaud the eternal fitness of things when she does come. At the California, people are applauding Bartley Campbell for a stirring, heart-tearing plot, Max Freeman for its gorgeous setting, Georgia Cayvan for her picturesque acting, Levick for his statuesque endurance of the Russian's heritage of misery, Louise Sylvester for emotional intensity. The ballet is regarded merely as an incidental. Yet how much of art there is even in this simple ballet. Its movements are as definite as those of a musical composition, with its introduction which might be the theme, its gracioso, its adagio, its variations, its excelsior solo, and its finale. I could wish a little drapery swinging about the plump sisters, whose pretty dance goes for nothing for lack of it; but when I realize how far we are from the home of Terpsichore, I feel quite proud of our little ballet."

"Dear Jack," I cried, "how I delight in your enthusiasm. Next week I am sure you will be raving like this over Nilsson."

But he shook his head a little dubiously. "Women will rave over her," he said. "The fair-haired Swede is essentially a woman's favorite, but so long as the world lasts, my girl, you will find the male creature's fancy wander intuitively to the ballet."

"Jack, would you stand in a line of fighting citizens all day to see a ballet?" And he made answer with such a vigorous "no," that I was satisfied.

BETSY B.

The programme for the first Nilsson concert will be as follows: Quintette in B flat, op. 87, allegro vivace, Mendelssohn Quintette Club; "Non e Ver," Signor Del Puente; "Angels ever bright and fair," Madame Christine Nilsson; Romanza, "Una furtiva lagrima," Monsieur Theodore Bjorksten; The Spirit Song, Miss Hope Glenn; Duo, "La ci dagem," Madame Christine Nilsson and Signor Del Puente; Violin Solo, Aïrs Hongrois, Mr. Isidor Schnitzler; Song, "Never Again," Miss Hope Glenn; "Jewel Song," Faust, Madame Christine Nilsson; Recit. and Aria, "Eri tu," Signor Del Puente; Boccherini Minuetto, Mendelssohn Quintette Club; Quartette, "Cosi fan tutte," Madame Christine Nilsson, Miss Glenn, M. Bjorksten, and Signor Del Puente.

CCLVIII.—Bill of Fare for Six Persons—Sunday, December 10.

Artichoke Soup.
Broiled Trout, with Sliced Lemon.
Beef à la Mode. Potatoes.
Mushrooms. Baked Tomatoes.
Roast Canvas-back Ducks, with Currant-jelly Sauce.
Potato Salad.
Pancakes with Peaches.
Apples, Figs, Guavas, Peaches, Pears, Japanese Persimmons, and Grapes.
PANCAKES WITH PEACHES.—Make a batter with four ounces of flour, two ounces of sugar, two ounces of melted butter, and three eggs; mix well, put some batter in a frying-pan and fry them on both sides of a light brown color; put them on a board; put some stewed peaches or apricots on them and roll them; put some fine sugar over and glaze them with a red-hot salamander, which is simply a round flat piece of iron fixed to an iron handle. With the round piece heated red-hot you glaze the surface of any dish after sprinkling it with sugar or bread crumbs. If no salamander is at hand, a kitchen-shovel may be used, the broad end being made red-hot.

Boston dispatches of the sixth instant state that:

The disagreement between Mrs. Langtry and Mrs. Labouchere is the topic of conversation. Fred Gebhard, who followed Mrs. Langtry to Boston, and who was the acquaintance objected to by Mrs. Labouchere, was among the first of Mrs. Langtry's New York admirers. Gebhard is a handsome young man of twenty-three, who lives at the Hotel Brunswick, keeps a four-in-hand and other equipments, all of which have been at Mrs. Langtry's command during her stay in New York. Gebhard has usually accompanied her during her drives. His father died a few years ago, leaving his son an income of about eighty thousand a year. The young man is well known at the opera and the lobbies of the principal theatres, and is a great dîner-out. He has the reputation of being discreet, quiet, temperate, and economical. It is said that his bill for flowers alone during Mrs. Langtry's short engagement in New York was nearly one thousand dollars.

The readers of the Argonaut may remember the dissection of Mr. Gebhard last May. It ran somewhat as follows: "Mr. Gebhard has his clothes, hats, boots, canes, and linen made in London, and drives a coach, a Stanhope, and a cart. He rides to hounds just like an Englishman, and can hold a glass in his eye fully twelve minutes at a time, provided he doesn't speak. His dialect is one of the most striking things on the American continent, and he always wears the colors of the Prince of Wales. He only notices the few Americans who can trace their ancestry back to English stock, and treats them with condescension truly beautiful." Mr. Gebhard since then has been jilted by Miss Louise Jerome, a lovely young New York girl to whom he was engaged. About the same time it was noised abroad that the secret of his parentage had finally been discovered, and that he is of Jewish extraction.

Prang's Prize X-mas Cards.

A FULL assortment of Prang's cards may now be found in the art and book stores.

A Christmas Novelty.

THE POPULAR Christmas card is with us again in greater variety than ever. The large prizes which Prang and other publishers offered, served to bring to the fore designs both novel and beautiful, still there were none fitting to send from California to the East and Europe; it seemed like sending coals to Newcastle. A novelty in cards, however, is being presented this season, consisting of a design representing the contrast between the winters of California and those of the East, accompanied by appropriate text. They are for sale only by Snow & Co., 12 Post Street, Masonic Temple. This store is open every evening.

Fine Holiday Goods.

IT IS REALLY a treat to make an inspection of the elegant establishment of Burnham, Beck & Co., at No. 618 Market Street, and Nos. 15 and 17 Post Street. Here can be found carpets of every description, and ranging in price from one dollar and a quarter per yard up to the most expensive. This house is the only one that has as yet been able to place on exhibition the new style of carpet called "Smyrna;" and it is indeed one of the novelties for covering the floor. It is one yard wide, and sells at one dollar and seventy-five cents a yard, and some is offered at one dollar and fifty cents. The borders which come with these carpets are exceedingly beautiful, and are shown in different widths. Another new carpet is what is known as "Super-ingrain." It comes in solid colors, such as olive-green, old gold, Magenta, crimson, and dark blue, with Florentine borders. It is intended principally for halls, though it makes a pretty covering for bed-rooms, and also as crumb-cloths, and is marked at one dollar and fifteen cents and one and a quarter. Then there are the latest European and Eastern designs in Axminster, Wilton, Body Brussels, etc.; but the pride of the store is a certain Moquette carpet, and this alone is certainly worth a visit. The ground is of a rich cream tint, over which are dispersed bits and sprigs of flowers which seem to drop from the edge of a cliff through a waterfall. The border is of full width, completes the picture by bridges and waterfalls. It is a wonderfully fine and closely woven fabric, and resembles in style and appearance the Aubusson. Burnham, Beck & Co. are making a specialty of the Moquettes, as they promise to be the fashion for parlors. In the curtain department of this firm are to be seen, among the great variety, the celebrated Madras, which, when hung, gives the appearance of stained glass. They come in sets, or by the yard, at very low prices. In furniture, one might say everything is here to be found, chamber sets being offered as low as thirty dollars. There are also a great variety of pretty novelties for holiday presents.

CONSUMPTION CURED.

AN OLD PHYSICIAN, retired from practice, having had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure for Consumption, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Asthma, and all Throat and Lung Affections, also a positive and radical cure for Nervous Debility and all Nervous Complaints, after having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, has felt it his duty to make it known to his suffering fellows. Actuated by this motive and a desire to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge, to all who desire it, this recipe, in German, French, or English, with full directions for preparing and using. Sent by mail by addressing with stamp, naming this paper, W. A. NOYES, 149 Power's Block, Rochester, New York.

—THE GREAT DISTINGUISHING FEATURE OF Redding's Russia Salve is its power to reduce inflammation.

—USE SOUTH PRAIRIE COAL.

—DON'T DIE IN THE HOUSE. "Rough on Rats." Clears out rats, mice, flies, roaches, bedbugs. 15c.

—LYDIA E. PINKHAM'S VEGETABLE COMPOUND cures all female complaints by removing the cause.

—IF PEOPLE WHO ARE TROUBLED WITH COLDS would make use of Ayer's Cherry Pectoral before attending church or public lectures, they would avoid coughing, and the comfort of hearers and speaker would be greatly promoted. The Pectoral enables public speakers to speak clearly and without fatigue, having an immediate and wonderful effect in increasing the power and flexibility of the human voice.

—"BUCHU-PAIBA." QUICK, COMPLETE CURE, all annoying Kidney Diseases. 5c. At Druggists.

—FOR AGED MEN, WOMEN, WEAK AND SICKLY children, without a rival. Will not cause headache. Brown's Iron Bitters.

—LADY READERS OF THE ARGONAUT WILL REMEMBER that the place to buy colognes, perfumery, toilet soaps, brushes, sponges, cosmetics, etc., is at the elegant and well-stocked store of James G. Steele & Co., Chemists and Apothecaries, 635 Market Street, Palace Hotel, San Francisco.

—MORSE HAS THE FINEST GALLERY IN THE world, 826 Market Street, (Phelan Block).

—DR. E. O. COCHRANE, DENTIST, 850 MARKET cor. Stockton (over drug store.) Office hours, 9 to 5.

—HEADQUARTERS FOR ELECTRIC BELTS, AND appliances for the cure of nervous, painful, and debilitating diseases. Pamphlets, with full particulars, free. Address PULVERMACHER GALVANIC COMPANY, 513 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Cal.

—GO TO Bradley & Rulofson's New Photographic Gallery, southeast corner Geary and Dupont streets.

ANDREWS & STOCKWELL'S GRAND OPERA HOUSE.

Mr. Henry E. Abbey respectfully announces the first appearance in San Francisco of

MADAME CHRISTINE NILSSON
IN FOUR GRAND CONCERTS, ON Tuesday Evening, December 12th, at 8:15;
Thursday Evening, December 14th, at 8:15;
Saturday Matinee, December 16th, at 2:15 P. M.
Monday Evening, December 18th, at 8:15.

Madame Nilsson will be assisted by the following eminent Artists: MISS HOPE GLENN, Contralto; M. THEODORE BJORKSTEN, Tenor; and SIGNOR GUISEPPE DEL PUENTE, Baritone, in conjunction with the MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB
of Boston—CHARLES E. PRATT, Pianist.

Scale of Prices.—Season Tickets for the series of four performances, $14. The sale of season tickets ONLY will commence on Monday, December 4th, at 10 A. M., at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s (agents Haines's pianos) music store, southwest corner Kearny and Sutter Streets, for one day ONLY. Season Tickets—$2, $3, and $4, according to location. The sale of single tickets will commence on Wednesday, December 6th, at 10 A. M., at above place.
MARCUS R. MAYER,
General Business Manager for Henry E. Abbey.

ART ASSOCIATION.

AN OPPORTUNITY OF A LIFETIME TO SEE
The most celebrated

COLLECTION OF PAINTINGS

...BY...
OLD MASTERS
Which ever left Europe, comprising 150 examples by Raphael, Titian, Rembrandt, Correggio, and others.
OPEN DAY AND EVENING.

771 MARKET STREET 771
KOHLER'S
AUSTRALIAN WAX WORKS
And Promenade Concerts.

Open from 9 A. M. to 10 P. M. Admission, 25 cents; children, 15 cents.

ELEGANT CHRISTMAS CARDS,
CHRISTMAS BOOKS,
PHOTOGRAPH & AUTOGRAPH
ALBUMS, ETC., ETC.

The largest stock and finest display of Christmas Cards on the Pacific Coast. Samples of over 800 different styles arranged so that all can be seen, with the prices plainly marked on each. A visit to the store to see these Christmas Cards is a sight no one should miss.

COOPER'S BOOKSTORE,
No. 746 Market Street.

X-MAS CARDS.

The largest and finest line in the city, wholesale and retail.
Specialty made of Cards exclusively.

J. J. EVANS, STATIONER,
436 California Street.
OPEN EVENINGS.

EASTON & ELDRIDGE,
Real Estate & General Auctioneers,
Office and Salesroom,
No. 22 MONTGOMERY STREET.

SPECIAL SALE

.....OF.....
DIAMOND WORK, JEWELRY,

.....AND.....
PLATED WARE.

WEDNESDAY,

Nov. 13, 1882, at 11 o'clock A. M.,

AT SALESROOM, BY CATALOGUE,

We will sell

Two pair large Solitaire Diamond Ear-rings.
Diamond Brooches and Rings, Fine Jewels, Watches, etc., etc., etc.

....ALSO,....

Plate, Tea, and Breakfast Sets,
Castors, Ice Pitchers, Wire
Stands, Pickle Jars, Salvers, Olive Stands, Spoons, Forks
etc., etc., etc.

All first-class goods, and to be sold in lots to suit buyers.

Catalogues now ready, and goods
open for exhibition on TUESDAY,
Nov. 12, from 10 A. M. to 4 P. M.

We call the attention of Ladies and all buyers to our sale as advertised.

SALE POSITIVE---TERMS CASH.

EASTON & ELDRIDGE,

AUCTIONEERS.

"FRENCH ART"

We are notified by the publishers that the IMPERIAL EDITION OF MASTER-PIECES OF FRENCH ART is wholly exhausted, that full sets command a premium, and that we are to return any copies we may have on hand.
This shows in what esteem the work is held at the East.

A. L. BANCROFT & CO.

FILIPPE'S ACADEMY OF LANGUAGES
235 KEARNY ST.

SOUTHWEST CORNER OF BUSH.
PROF. DE FILIPPE continues to give personal instruction in Spanish and French, by his easy, practical method, saving months of study. Classes and private lessons. Apply from 3 to 5 or 7 to 8 P. M.

RUPTURE Cured. Greatest Invention of the age. FIERCE & SUT-TON, 704 Sac. St., San Fran. Cal.

JNO. LEVY & CO.

118 SUTTER STREET,

Makers and Importers of Fine

JEWELRY,

Have made extensive preparations for the HOLIDAY TRADE, and have added a most exquisite and odd line of NOVELTIES to their already ELEGANT STOCK of DIAMONDS, PRECIOUS
STONES, WATCHES, SILVERWARE, CARRIAGE and MANTEL
CLOCKS, OPERA GLASSES, FANS, etc., together making the handsomest display of goods ever exhibited in this city. We cordially invite an inspection of our stock, it being no trouble to show goods. Everything marked in plain figures and strictly one price.

WE SELL AT CLOSER PRICES THAN ANY HOUSE IN OUR LINE.

OPEN EVENINGS.

COLMAN BROS.

Stylish and Serviceable CLOTHING at Lowest Prices. In every department our goods are marked for sale at the merest advance over manufacturing cost. The pinnacle of success attained in our Men's, Boys', and Children's Departments. Our original styles at popular low prices, compelling buyers to patronize us. Satisfaction guaranteed. Established 1853.

LEADING CLOTHIERS,

SOUTHWEST CORNER MONTGOMERY AND BUSH STREETS.

N. B.—A large variety of Dressing Gowns and Smoking Jackets just received direct from Europe.

HOLIDAY GOODS.

Elegant imported Leather and Fancy Goods, beautiful Juveniles.
Finely bound Standard and Artistic Gift Books.
Christmas Cards, from English, European and American makers.

C. BEACH,

107 MONTGOMERY ST., OPPOSITE THE OCCIDENTAL.

OPEN EVENINGS.

Books

MAKE THE BEST HOLIDAY PRESENTS.

Holiday Books, Books in Binding, Glove Boxes, Dressing Cases, Fancy Articles, Useful Presents.

CHRISTMAS CARDS.

DOXEY'S

23 DUPONT STREET, SAN FRANCISCO.

ESTABLISHED 1858.

W. K. VANDERSLICE & CO.

MANUFACTURING

JEWELERS AND SILVERSMITHS.

AMERICAN WATCHES, CHATELAINES in Gold and Silver. DIA-MONDS in single stones and matched pairs, and an elegant line of JEWELRY, including all the latest novelties for HOLIDAY GIFTS,
at the very closest prices.

136 SUTTER STREET.

OPEN EVENINGS.

If you desire to make an elegant
and useful CHRISTMAS GIFT, present your friend with a

WAKEFIELD RATTAN CHAIR.

This CUT represents our LADIES' ARLINGTON
ROCKER, No. 494, $8.50.

We have now in stock the finest assortment ever offered in this city.
Send for Catalogue.

WAKEFIELD RATTAN CO.,

644 Market Street.

THE "Dress Reform" CORSET.

Specially for Stout Figures, (worn with or without Straps, by mail, $3.00. Send waist, hip, and bust measure.
Also, Shoulder Braces, Union
Under Flannels, Ladies' and
Children's Comfort Waists,
Bustles, Hose Supporters, etc.
Send for Circular. The only
Depot for these goods.

MRS. M. H. OBER & CO.
Boston Dress Reform,
326 Sutter Street,
SAN FRANCISCO.

An Elegant Corset to
Order for $4.

NEW EDITION NOW READY.

Bartlett's Familiar Quotations.

Eighth Edition, Greatly Enlarged.

12mo. Cloth, $3.00; half-calf, $5.00.

This edition has been entirely recast from new type. It contains large additions, besides quotations from one hundred and twenty-five authors who are not represented in any former edition. More than six thousand lines have been added to the Index.

"Most valuable, convenient, indispensable, and altogether admirable collection of quotations."—O. W. Holmes.

Bartlett's Shakespeare Phrase-book

12mo. 1,038 pages. Cloth, $3.00; half calf, $5.00.

From the Century.

"A grand combination concordance and glossary to Shakespeare.... The book, as a whole, is one of the most valuable ever published for the use of intelligent students of Shakespeare. The general reader needs no ampler concordance, no better guide to Shakespeare's beauties of phrase, or even of thought; no completer record of the variations of the text."

Richard Grant White says: "It is the best of its kind that I know of. The most valuable Shakespeare reference-book in existence."

LITTLE, BROWN & CO., Publishers, 254 Washington Street—Boston.

J. R. COWEN. J. W. PORTER.

COWEN & PORTER,

FUNERAL DIRECTORS,

118 Geary Street, San Francisco.

OPPOSITE STARR-KING CHURCH.

C. P. SHEFFIELD, N. W. SPAULDING, J. PATTERSON

17 and 19 FREMONT ST., SAN FRANCISCO.

CHRISTMAS CARDS AND FINE STATIONERY

AT DODGE, BROS. & SHREVE, 32 GEARY

THE TUNEFUL LIAR.

Something Too Much.

In Cromwell's time a maiden fair
Swung on a bell, all for her lover;
And ever since, nine times a year,
The "correspondents" man must hover

Above his scrap-book, and take out,
To print again, unhappy wight,
Just how she said, to save her lout,
"The curfew must not ring to-night!"

I've read, once more, these verses through,
And though I have a heart that's mellow,
I wish to gracious—yes, I do—
That Cromwell had well hanged the fellow!

—Louisville Courier-Journal.

The Song of Solomon.

Young King Solomon,
Like all mankind, with life before 'em,
Was a right bold and jolly man,
And thought of wives he'd take a quorum;
With now and then a sort of spouse
Who didn't stand on marriage-vows,
To sugar coat them o'er.

It was a conjugal idea
That might have suited such as we are,
With Jerusalem and all Judea

To foot the score.
Young King Sol—
Fol de rol lol;

If ever any ache or ill he had,
He soothed it with these balms of Gilead—
Young King Sol!

He drank, and danced, and played the 'cello,
Wrote songs, and sang, like a gay fellow,
Fol de rol lol,
Fol de rol lol,
Fol de rol lol—
Young King Sol!

Brave King Solomon
Kept marrying till people wondered
To see a wise and holy man

Run up a score of seven hundred;
But, though he took the sugar-coats
Right merrily as an antidote.

He got an overdose.
Just think of his domestic bothers!
Seven hundred wives—three hundred others
Almost as bad—and all their mothers—

At once broke loose!
Brave King Sol—
Fol de rol lol;

He saw his load, and tried to pack it;
But when he had to face the racket—
Brave King Sol!

He danced no more, nor played the 'cello,
But, like a Bashan bull, would bellow,
Fol de rol lol,
Fol de rol lol,
Fol de rol lol—
Brave King Sol!

Poor King Solomon,
In youth so gay and level-headed,
Became a melancholy man,

Being too much concubined and wedded;
Oh, pity him his thousand wives,
Ye generous married men, whose lives
Are miserable with one!

For, surely he had come to hate 'em,
When he declared them, seriatim,
As vanitas vanitatum

Beneath the sun.
Poor King Sol—
Fol de rol lol;

He sank at last upon the stony
And cheerless road of matrimony—
Poor King Sol!

With somewhat of his fate before us,
Let's solemnly repeat the chorus:
Fol de rol lol,
Fol de rol lol,
Fol de rol lol—
Poor old Sol!

FRESNO, Nov. 29, 1882. JOSEPH T. GOODMAN.

The Wheel.

See the wheeler with his wheel,
Silent wheel.
How many murderous thoughts pass through our mind as past be steals;

As he glides along the pave
With the silence of the grave.
And the crystalline glittering of nickel-plated steel
Bursts upon the enraptured sight,

As it flashes dazzling bright,
Till the gamins, with delight, (Which the ordinary mortal and pedestrian can not feel),

Yell out, "See the blooming hijit on his alitood'nous
wheel,

On his lofty, and exalted, and velocipedic wheel;
On his wheel, wheel, wheel, wheel, wheel, wheel,
wheel,

On his lofty and velocipedic wheel.

Hear the tinkling of his bell,
Little bell.

As it warns the folks to give him room before he gives them—Tophet.

And he dings it all the while,
With a feeble, vacant smile,
As he works his number twelve in a rhythmic kind of style.

And the people, ah! they think,
When they hear that tinkle tink,
"Here comes old Darwin's lost one; here comes the missing link!"

And they positively feel Like smashing up his wheel,
And implanting on his pantaloons some wounds that wouldn't heal.

That would cause him to stand upright as he takes his midday meal,
And would give him beaps of trouble as he sat upon his wheel,

On his wheel, wheel, wheel, wheel, wheel, wheel,
wheel,

On his nickel-plated, highly polished wheel.
—Unknown Liar.

TRUE ASSISTANT TO NATURE IN RESTORING to perfect health, thus enabling it to resist
Brown's Iron Bitters.

A NOTED BUT UNTITLED WOMAN.

[From the Boston Globe.]

Messrs. Editors:—

The above is a good likeness of Mrs. Lydia E. Pinkham, of Lynn, Mass., who above all other human beings may be truthfully called the "Dear Friend of Woman," as some of her correspondents love to call her. She is zealously devoted to her work, which is the outcome of a life-story, and is obliged to keep six lady assistants, to help her answer the large correspondence which daily pours in upon her, each bearing its special burden of suffering, or joy at release from it. Her Vegetable Compound is a medicine for good and not evil purposes. I have personally investigated it and am satisfied of the truth of this.

On account of its proven merits, it is recommended and prescribed by the best physicians in the country. One says: "It works like a charm and saves much pain. It will entirely cure the worst forms of female diseases."

It permeates every portion of the system, and gives new life and vigor. It removes faintness, flatulency, destroys all craving for stimulants, and relieves weakness of the stomach. It cures Bloating, Headaches, Nervous Prostration, General Debility, Sleeplessness, Depression and Indigestion. That feeling of bearing down, causing pain, weight and headache, is always permanently cured by its use. It will at all times, and under all circumstances, act in harmony with the law that governs the female system.

It costs only $1. per bottle or six for $5., and is sold by druggists. Any advice required as to special cases, and the names of many who have been restored to perfect health by the use of the Vegetable Compound, can be obtained by addressing Mrs. P., with stamp for reply, at her home in Lynn, Mass.

For Kidney Complaint of either sex this compound is unsurpassed as abundant testimonials show.

"Mrs. Pinkham's Liver Pills," says one writer, "are the best in the world for the cure of Constipation, Biliousness and Torpidity of the Liver. Her Blood Purifier works wonders in its special line and bids fair to equal the Compound in its popularity."

All must respect her as an Angel of Mercy whose sole ambition is to do good to others.

Philadelphia, Pa. (2) Mrs. A. M. D.

No Whiskey!

BROWN'S IRON BITTERS
is one of the very few tonic medicines that are not composed mostly of alcohol or whiskey, thus becoming a fruitful source of intemperance by promoting a desire for rum.

BROWN'S IRON BITTERS
is guaranteed to be a non-intoxicating stimulant, and it will, in nearly every case, take the place of all liquor,
and at the same time absolutely kill the desire for whiskey and other intoxicating beverages.

Rev. G. W. RICE, editor of the American Christian Review, says of Brown's Iron Bitters:

Cin., O., Nov. 16, 1881.

Gents:—The foolish wasting of vital force in business, pleasure, and vicious indigence of our people, makes your preparation a necessity;
and if applied, will save hundreds who resort to saloons for temporary recuperation.

BROWN'S IRON BITTERS
has been thoroughly tested for dyspepsia, indigestion, biliousness, weakness, debility, overwork, rheumatism, neuralgia, consumption, liver complaints, kidney troubles, &c., and it never fails to render speedy and permanent relief.

AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL,

For Diseases of the Throat and Lungs, such as Coughs, Colds, Whooping Cough, Bronchitis, Asthma, and Consumption.

The few compositions which have won the confidence of mankind and become household words, among not only one but many nations, must have extraordinary virtues. Perhaps no one ever secured so wide a reputation, or maintained it so long, as AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL. It has been known to the public about forty years, by a long continued series of marvelous cures, that have won for it a confidence in its virtues never equalled by any other medicine. It still makes the most effectual cures of Coughs, Colds, and Consumption that can be made by medical skill. Indeed, the CHERRY PECTORAL has really robbed these dangerous diseases of their terrors to a great extent, and given a feeling of immunity from their painful effects, that is well founded, if the remedy be taken in season. Every family should have it in their closet for the ready and prompt relief of its members. Sickness, suffering, and even life is saved by this timely defense. The prudent should not neglect it, and the wise will not. Keep it by you for the protection it affords by its early use in sudden attacks.

PREPARED BY

DR. J. C. AYER & Co., Lowell, Mass.

PRACTICAL AND ANALYTICAL CHEMISTS.

Sold by all Druggists and Dealers in Medicines.

ONE MILLION COPIES SOLD!

Everybody Wants It!

Everybody Needs It!

KNOW THYSELF.

The untold miseries that result from indiscretions in early life may be alleviated and cured. Those who doubt this assertion should purchase the new medical work published by the Peabody Medical Institute, Boston, Mass.

THE SCIENCE OF LIFE, OR SELF-PRESERVATION.

Exhausted Vitality, Nervous and Physical Debility, Premature Decline in Man, or Vitality impaired by too close application to business, may be restored, and manhood regained.

Two hundred and fifty-eighth edition, revised and enlarged, just published. It is a standard medical work, the best in the English language, written by a physician of great experience, to whom was awarded a gold and jeweled medal by the National Medical Association. It contains beautiful and very expensive engravings, 300 pages, more than 125 valuable prescriptions for all forms of diseases, acute and chronic, the result of many years of extensive and successful practice, any one of which is worth ten times the price of the book. Bound in beautiful French cloth, embossed, full gilt. Price, only $1.25, by mail, securely sealed, postpaid, on receipt of price. Illustrated sample, 6 cents. Send now.

THE SCIENCE OF LIFE, OR SELF-PRESERVATION.

Is beyond all comparison the most extraordinary work on Physiology ever published. There is nothing whatever that the married or single can either require or wish to know but what is fully explained.—London Lancet.

THE SCIENCE OF LIFE, OR SELF-PRESERVATION.

Is a marvel of art and beauty, warranted to be a better medical book in every sense than can be obtained elsewhere for double the price, or the money will be refunded in every instance.—Author.

N. B.—YOUNG and MIDDLE-AGED MEN can save much life, suffering, and expense by reading the Science of Life, or conferring with the author, who may be consulted on all diseases requiring skill and experience. Address

PEABODY MEDICAL INSTITUTE,
Or W. H. PARKER, M. D.,
4 Bulfinch Street, Boston, Mass.

Write for Large Illustrated Catalogue.
Rifles, Shot Guns, Revolvers, sent a. o. d. for examination.

BEST AND BELCHER SILVER

Mining Company—Location of works, Virginia City, Storey County, Nevada. Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Directors, held on the eighteenth (18th) day of November, 1882, an assessment (No. 25) of Fifty (50) Cents per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately, in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room No. 29, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on Friday, the 22nd day of December, 1882, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction; and unless payment is made before, will be sold on Friday, the 26th day of January, 1883, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale.

WILLIAM WILLIS, Secretary.
Office—Room No. 29 Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

CALIFORNIA MINING COMPANY.

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 21st day of November, 1882, an assessment (No. 6) of Twenty (20) Cents per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately, in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room No. 23, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the 29th day of December, 1882, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction; and unless payment is made before, will be sold on Friday, the 26th day of January, 1883, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

C. P. GORDON, Secretary.
Office—Room 23, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery St., San Francisco Cal.

411 413 & 415 SANSOME ST. S.F.

Importers of All Kinds of Paper.

THUNDER POWDER COMPANY.

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California; location of works, Alameda County, California.

NOTICE.—There are delinquent upon the following delinquent stock, on account of assessment (No. 7) levied on the fifteenth day of August, 1882, the several amounts set opposite the names of the respective shareholders, as follows:

Name	Cert. No.	No. Shares.	Amount.
Charles DeLacy, Trustee.....	3	5	$2 00
Charles DeLacy, Trustee.....	37	10,000	4,000 00
Charles DeLacy, Trustee.....	73	200	80 00
Charles DeLacy, Trustee.....	74	300	120 00
Charles DeLacy, Trustee.....	79	14,955	5,982 00
Charles DeLacy, Trustee.....	87	6,000	2,400 00
F. M. Pixley.....	4	5	not issued 2 00
F. M. Pixley, Trustee.....	5	995	398 00
W. W. Dodge.....	6	5	2 00
W. W. Dodge, Trustee.....	7	995	398 00
E. G. Waite.....	8	5	2 00
E. G. Waite, Trustee.....	9	2,495	998 00
Geo. W. Prescott.....	10	5	2 00
Geo. W. Prescott, Trustee.....	11	995	398 00
Wm. Sherman.....	12	5	2 00
Wm. Sherman, Trustee.....	13	2,495	998 00
E. M. Anthony, Trustee.....	14	1,000	400 00
John A. Benson, Trustee.....	15	2,000	800 00
Theodore Wagner, Trustee.....	16	1,000	400 00
M. Balbridge, Trustee.....	17	1,500	not issued 600 00
Fred'k Lux, Trustee.....	18	1,000	400 00
Charles Camden, Trustee.....	19	2,000	800 00
Jackson Hart, Trustee.....	20	1,000	400 00
R. D. Lennox, Trustee.....	21	500	200 00
Daniel Gorham, Trustee.....	22	500	200 00
Theodore Greene, Trustee.....	23	1,000	400 00
Eugene L. Sullivan, Trustee.....	24	1,000	400 00
Walter Mead, Trustee.....	25	500	not issued 200 00
J. H. Fish, Trustee.....	26	500	200 00
E. E. Frasier, Trustee.....	27	1,000	400 00
T. E. Frasier, Trustee.....	28	1,000	400 00
T. E. Frasier, Trustee.....	29	1,000	400 00
T. E. Frasier, Trustee.....	30	1,000	400 00
L. C. Kelly, Trustee.....	31	1,000	400 00
Chas. S. Neal.....	32	5	2 00
Wm. F. Flick.....	33	5	2 00
Chas. H. Hopkins.....	34	5	2 00
Wm. Wilson.....	35	5	2 00
Benj. Teal.....	36	5	2 00
F. C. Kiel, Trustee.....	37	1,000	400 00
F. C. Kiel, Trustee.....	38	1,000	400 00
Wm. Heick, Trustee.....	39	1,000	400 00
Wm. Heick, Trustee.....	40	1,000	400 00
John F. Baxter, Trustee.....	41	3,000	not issued 1,200 00
David S. Sherman, Trustee.....	42	3,000	1,200 00
W. H. Campbell, Trustee.....	43	1,000	400 00
R. N. Bourne, Trustee.....	44	500	200 00
Theodore Wagner, Trustee.....	45	500	200 00
Geo. E. Barnes, Trustee.....	46	200	80 00
Chas. Wilson, Trustee.....	47	100	40 00
L. E. Crane, Trustee.....	48	50	20 00
S. B. Herriman, Trustee.....	49	50	20 00
A. P. Bauton, Trustee.....	50	50	20 00
W. W. Glazier, Trustee.....	51	50	not issued 20 00
H. W. Newbauer, Trustee.....	52	250	100 00
L. Hafen, Trustee.....	53	250	100 00
Theodore Wagner, Trustee.....	54	1,000	400 00
Matthew Clark, Trustee.....	55	500	200 00
James S. Porteous, Trustee.....	56	500	200 00
Thos. Legg, Trustee.....	57	100	40 00

And in accordance with law, and an order of the Board of Directors made on the fifteenth day of August, 1882, so many shares of each parcel of such stock as may be necessary will be sold at public auction at the company's office, No. 606 Montgomery Street, Room 3, San Francisco, California, on Monday, the ninth day of October, 1882, at the hour of one o'clock P. M. of said day, to pay said delinquent assessment thereon, together with costs of advertising and expenses of the sale.

C. M. OAKLEY, Secretary.
Office—Room 3, Sherman Building, No. 606 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

POSTPONEMENT.—The sale day of the above delinquent stock is hereby postponed until the sixteenth (16th) day of October, 1882, at the same place and hour. By order of the Board of Directors.

C. M. OAKLEY, Secretary.

POSTPONEMENT.—The sale day of the above delinquent stock is hereby postponed until the thirtieth (30th) day of October, 1882, at the same place and hour. By order of the Board of Directors.

C. M. OAKLEY, Secretary.

POSTPONEMENT.—The sale day of the above delinquent stock is hereby postponed until the sixth (6th) day of November, 1882, at the same place and hour. By order of the Board of Directors.

C. M. OAKLEY, Secretary.

POSTPONEMENT.—The sale day of the above delinquent stock is hereby postponed until the thirteenth (13th) day of November, 1882, at the same place and hour. By order of the Board of Directors.

C. M. OAKLEY, Secretary.

POSTPONEMENT.—The sale day of the above delinquent stock is hereby postponed until the twentieth (20th) day of November, 1882, at the same place and hour. By order of the Board of Directors.

C. M. OAKLEY, Secretary.

POSTPONEMENT.—The sale day of the above delinquent stock is hereby postponed until the twenty-seventh (27th) day of November, 1882, at the same place and hour. By order of the Board of Directors.

C. M. OAKLEY, Secretary.

POSTPONEMENT.—The sale day of the above delinquent stock is hereby postponed until the eleventh (11th) day of December, 1882, at the same place and hour. By order of the Board of Directors.

C. M. OAKLEY, Secretary.

POSTPONEMENT.—The sale day of the above delinquent stock is hereby postponed until the twentieth (20th) day of December, 1882, at the same place and hour. By order of the Board of Directors.

C. M. OAKLEY, Secretary.

POSTPONEMENT.—The sale day of the above delinquent stock is hereby postponed until the twenty-seventh (27th) day of December, 1882, at the same place and hour. By order of the Board of Directors.

C. M. OAKLEY, Secretary.

Office—Room 79, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco Cal

R. H. McDonald,
President,
San Francisco,
Cal.

PACIFIC BANK
Established
1863.
Capital Stock
$1,000,000.00
Surplus 460,800.70

San Francisco, Cal., July 1, 1882.
We take pleasure in presenting for your consideration the following Thirty-eighth Semi-Annual Statement of the condition of this Bank:

RESOURCES.
Bank Premises.....	$150,000 00
Other Real Estate.....	12,825 35
United States Bonds.....	629,507 60
Land Association Stock.....	15,121 55
Loans and Discounts.....	1,785,000 20
Due from Banks.....	527,279 09
Money on hand.....	632,363 30
LIABILITIES.	$3,752,099 69
Capital paid up.....	$1,000,000 00
Surplus.....	460,800 70
Due Depositors.....	1,953,672 80
Due Banks.....	337,491 09
Dividends unpaid.....	134 50
	$3,752,099 69

This Bank has special facilities for doing all kinds of banking business.

A NEW BODLEY BOOK.

The Bodley Grandchildren,
AND THEIR JOURNEY IN HOLLAND. By Horace E. Scudder, author of the other Bodley books. With many illustrations and a very attractive cover. $1.50.
The host of young and older readers who have enjoyed the previous Bodley books will be delighted with this, which introduces a new set of Bodleys, who have a wonderful good time in Holland, seeing its curious sights, and hearing the exceedingly interesting stories of its history.

American Statesmen.

1. John Quincy Adams. By John T. Morse, Jr. $1.25.
 2. Alexander Hamilton. By Henry Cabot Lodge. $1.25.
 3. John C. Calhoun. By Dr. H. Von Holst. $1.25.
 4. Andrew Jackson. By Prof. W. G. Sumner, Yale College. $1.25.
 5. John Randolph. By Henry Adams. $1.25.
- Admirable brief biographies of leading American statesmen, in connection with the political history of the country. Beautiful library books.

Several other volumes in preparation.

American Men of Letters.

Edited by Charles Dudley Warner.

1. Washington Irving. By Charles D. Warner. With fine portrait. $1.25.
 2. Noah Webster. By Horace E. Scudder, author of the "Bodley Books." With portrait. $1.25.
 3. Henry D. Thoreau. By Frank B. Sanborn. With fine steel portrait. $1.25.
 4. George Ripley. By O. B. Frothingham. With fine portrait. $1.25.
- Excellent brief biographies of men famous in American literature. Admirable household books.

Several other volumes in preparation.

Longfellow and Emerson Calendars for 1883.

The former has a capital portrait, and a view of Longfellow's home; the latter, a view of Emerson's home. Both are admirably designed, printed in rich and tasteful colors, with choice selections for each day—the most desirable calendars ever produced in America. $1.00 each.

* For sale by all booksellers. Sent by mail, postpaid, on receipt of price, by the publishers.

Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston.

Messrs. H. M. & Co. will send to any address a Catalogue of all their publications, containing portraits of many of their most famous authors.

THREE EXQUISITE BOOKS!

Longfellow Birthday Book.

With a fine portrait and 12 illustrations. Beautifully bound. Cloth, $1; limp calf or sealskin, $3.50.

Emerson Birthday Book.

With a new portrait and 12 illustrations. Tastefully bound. Cloth, $1; flexible calf or sealskin, $3.50.

Whittier Birthday Book.

With a fine portrait and 12 illustrations. Elegantly bound. Cloth, $1; flexible calf or sealskin, $3.50.

These three little volumes are gems of books. On the left-hand pages are choice extracts from the writings of Longfellow, Emerson, and Whittier, for each day of the year.

On the right-hand pages, under the several dates, are interesting memoranda—birthdays of famous persons are indicated, the occurrence of noteworthy events which the writers have commemorated; and there are blank spaces for the autographs of friends on their birthdays, and for any memoranda which the owner of the book wishes to record for special days.

These little books are a happy combination of gift-book and autograph album, and on account of their tastefulness, literary attractiveness, and illustrations, are worthy of a place in every intelligent household.

N. B.—These books are charming and appropriate gifts for birthdays.

* For sale by all booksellers. Sent by mail, postpaid, on receipt of price by the Publishers.

HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN & CO.,

4 Park Place, Boston, Mass.

NOVELTIES

FOR THE HOLIDAYS.

LOUIS BRAVERMAN & CO.

119 MONTGOMERY STREET,

Invite public attention to the finest and best selected stock of Novelties in WATCHES, DIAMONDS, JEWELRY, SILVERWARE, and FRENCH CLOCKS ever exhibited here. Direct importation in every branch enables us to sell goods at lower prices than any house in the city.

Every description of fine DIAMOND WORK and JEWELRY manufactured to order.

STORE OPEN EVERY EVENING DURING DECEMBER.

PIANOS

HENRY F. MILLER, OF BOSTON,

HEMME & LONG, OF SAN FRANCISCO,

GROVESTEEN & FULLER, OF NEW YORK,

TAYLOR & FARLEY ORGANS.

WOODWORTH, SCHELL & CO.,

Sole Agents, 105 Stockton Street, San Francisco.

PIANOS TO RENT.

THE CALIFORNIA FURNITURE MANUFACTURING COMPANY

Invite the public to visit their

WAREROOMS, 220 TO 226 BUSH STREET

And inspect their

NEW GOODS

Which constitute

THE FINEST DISPLAY OF FURNITURE

Ever shown on the Coast, and which cannot be excelled for Variety and Beauty upon this Continent.

Bring your Friends along. The Rich can gratify their Tastes; the Poor can supply their Wants.

THE CALA. FURNITURE MFG CO., 220 TO 226 BUSH ST.

MUSICAL BOXES.

M. J. PAILLARD & CO., 23 Dupont Street, San Francisco, Manufacturers and Importers. A. E. TULLERAT, Exclusive Agent. Musical Boxes repaired.

KNABE PIANOS
"I have never seen their equal."—Clara Louise Kellogg.
A. L. Bancroft & Co., 721 Market St., S. F., Sole Agents.

FOR FINE HOLIDAY WINES,
J. CUNDLACH & CO.
Cor. Market and Second,
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

J. W. EVANS,

General Agent, 29 Post Street, S. F.

J. M. LITCHFIELD & CO.

MERCHANT TAILORS,

And Dealers in Gents' Furnishing Goods,

415 MONTGOMERY STREET,

Bet. California and Sacramento San Francisco

"IT IS ALMOST HUMAN."

THE NORTON
DOOR-CHECK AND SPRING.

D. S. BROWN & CO., No. 36 California Street,

Sole Agents for Pacific Coast.

FAMILIES

LEAVING THE CITY.

FURNITURE, TRUNKS, PIANOS,
PICTURES, CARPETS stored and taken care of.

Having no rent to pay, we store goods low. Advances made. References, dating back 21 years, given.

H. WINDEL & CO. 310 Stockton Street.

DIVIDEND NOTICE—OFFICE OF

the Silver King Mining Company, San Francisco, Dec. 5, 1882.—At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the above-named Company held this day, a Dividend (No. 36) of Twenty-five Cents (25c.) per share was declared, payable on Friday, Dec. 15th, 1882, at the office of the Company, Room 19, 328 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California. Transfer books will close Dec. 9, 1882, at 3 P. M. JOSEPH NASH, Sec.

DIVIDEND NOTICE—OFFICE OF

the Standard Consolidated Mining Company, San Francisco, Dec. 2, 1882.—At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the above named Company, held this day, dividend No. 48, of Twenty-five cents per share was declared, payable on Tuesday, December 12, 1882, at the office in this city, or at the Farmers' Loan and Trust Company in New York. WM. WILLIS, Secretary.

Office—Room No. 29, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Cal.

EXTRA DIVIDEND NOTICE—Office

of the Standard Consolidated Mining Company, San Francisco, December 2, 1882.—At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the above named Company, held this day, an extra dividend (No. 49), of twenty-five cents per share, was declared, payable on Tuesday, December 12, 1882, at the office in this city, or at the Farmers' Loan and Trust Company in New York. WM. WILLIS, Secretary.

Office—Room No. 29, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Cal.

J. C. MERRILL & CO.,

Shipping and Commission Merchants

204 and 206 California Street,

SAN FRANCISCO.

The Regular Dispatch line of Packets to Honolulu, H. I.

ART-PAINTED, PLAIN and GLAZED

TILES

For Decorations.

W. W. MONTAGUE & CO.

110 to 118 Battery Street.

CRUSHED INDIAN.

A NEW AND DELICIOUS PREPARATION
FROM CORN, FOR BREAKFAST. IT COOKS
THOROUGHLY IN A FEW MINUTES.

TRY IT.
FOR SALE BY ALL
GROCERS.

The Argonaut.

VOL. XI. NO. 25.

SAN FRANCISCO, DECEMBER 16, 1882.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

PLUCKED FROM THE BURNING.

A Picture of the Earth's Condition after the Fiery Cataclysm of 1883.

Sequel to "Into the Sun."

"Where am I?" I exclaimed, as I rubbed my eyes and looked around me, gazing with mingled curiosity and awe on the unaccustomed objects which I saw.

There responded a long-bearded and grey-shouldered man in an unknown tongue, as he bent over the pallet on which I was lying, and proceeded to anoint my skin, (I perceived that I was naked,) with an unguent that recalled the fancied perfume of some oriental nard that I had read of, but could not at the moment identify.

I tried to raise my head from the pillow, but the muscles refused to respond to the action of the will. Helplessly I dropped my eyes to the inferior portion of my frame, and beheld, with sickening apprehension, that I was scarred and blistered from neck to foot. At the same time I perceived that I was lying upon robes or sheets of the finest silk. Such extraordinary care contrasted strangely with the paltry surroundings of the chamber, and such luxury applied to myself—for the extent of it I could appreciate—strangely with the seemingly ascetic poverty of the person who stood beside me. I had no difficulty, however, in determining, from the architectural points of the chamber, and the features, dress, and intonation of my companion, that I was in some Mongolian settlement—how or where was an inconceivable mystery. Memory, for the moment was a blank. Suddenly a flood of thought surged through my brain. In an instant I recalled the events of that fearful day in San Francisco—the ascent in the balloon, the aspect of the ruined city, the tragic death of the doctor, and my own imminent destruction when I became senseless.

How long I had lain in a comatose condition, I, of course, do not know; but, judging from the extraordinary distance traversed in the interim, either the time must have been considerable, or I must have been hurled with inconceivable velocity, in the heart of the storm, to where I now lay.

To cross an ocean and hundreds of leagues of continent in a condition of insensibility does not fall to the lot of every one, and my astonishment may be imagined when I at last discovered how I had been found by the monks of the Buddhist monastery of Badid upon the northern slope of the Himalayas, on a plateau near by, lying apparently dead, near the fragments of what had once been the balloon and car.

My theory is that my balloon was caught up by a body of heated air of vast volume, when about to plunge into the fiery abyss, and that this body of air, naturally rising to an upper stratum, was, in its turn, pressed forward by an air-current of tremendous velocity, naturally following the westward course of the sun. My strange appearance and the extraordinary manner in which I had reached their neighborhood, coupled with the recent tremendous spectacle which they had witnessed in the nocturnal heavens—for by the time the sun had risen upon Central Asia the force of the comet's collision had been spent, and the heat experienced at this altitude had been barely sufficient to melt a few feet of the everlasting snows—the entire circumstances attending my advent among them, I repeat, had caused them to regard me with a certain superstitious awe, and to treat me with the consideration I have already referred to.

So far as this portion of our earth was concerned, the fierce and fiery cataclysm, which had wrought such ruin upon those regions subjected to the full potency of the blazing orb, had been represented only by the terrible auroral display, which, according to the monks, had traveled round the half circuit of the heavens from west to east in blood-red anger, but had faded away before the first beams of morning brightened the sky. They regarded it, I also learned, as a presage of the second coming of the original Buddha.

The seclusion of the Tibetan highlanders is so great, and their intercourse with the outside world so limited and infrequent, that it was weeks before the vague and terrible rumors, which were wafted faintly from the lowlands of China, began to impress them more strongly with the possible truth of the terrible story which I had attempted to convey to them by signs and broken expressions.

Day by day the desire became more intense within me to revisit the haunts of men, and learn the worst regarding the catastrophe. I had already acquired, during my two months' sojourn at the monastery, a sufficient acquaintance with the Tibetan tongue to enable me to express myself upon ordinary topics with considerable fluency, and my representations exercised such an effect upon Dchiamdcham, one of the most enlightened of the monks, that he yielded to my solicitations and consented to persuade the rest to make a journey of exploration. As by degrees I gained greater command of the language, and Dchiamdcham and myself managed to reach the intellects of the monks, blinded as they were by ignorance and prejudice, and blurred by superstition, it became evident that their curiosity was becoming piqued as fast as their feelings were becoming interested. When the spring opened, and the snows melted away upon the surrounding slopes, they were ready to accompany me on an expedition to the plains. Dchiamdcham had not in vain employed his arguments, and exhausted his store of rhetoric, in convincing his brethren that one of their main duties lay, in a case of this sort, in assisting mankind. Accordingly a troop of thirty of the youngest members of the society were drafted for the expedition, the rest, including the older and weaker of the brethren, being left to guard the several interests of the fraternity. The villages and settlements we passed upon our way for the first two days were tenanted by natives who repeated the strange tales we had previously heard.

A day or two later, after crossing many spurs and mountain ranges, we debouched upon the Valley of the Kinsha Kiang, or, as it is called during its lower course, the Yang-tze Kiang. As we gradually descended from the higher plateaus we entered regions where the vegetation was parched and lifeless. Houses and villages were either desolate or tenanted only by half-famished creatures, who answered our questions in a dazed and bewildered way. Despair seemed to have settled on them. Their flocks and herds seemed scarcely able to sustain existence upon the scant and desiccated herbage. A calamity, which they were able neither to comprehend nor cope with, had fallen upon them and deprived them of heart and courage.

We had remarked for the past few days that the climate had changed to a greater degree than would, under ordinary circumstances, have been the case. Humidity was its prevailing feature. Dense cloud-masses rolled over our heads and obscured the sun. As we neared the Chinese lowlands rain fell almost incessantly. The same scenes met our gaze which we had encountered in the more mountainous country, only intensified in their ghastly significance. Dead and decaying bodies of men, women, children, and domestic animals lay promiscuously about at every turn, and in every conceivable posture, as if they had been stricken by some fell pestilence.

As we gazed, the heavens shed sluggish rain-drops as though weeping. It was only too convincing, the awful thought that here, at the western limit of the vast realm of China, we stood at the gates of a tremendous cemetery, rich with the steaming remains of hundreds of millions of human creatures, and countless myriads of species of the animal and vegetable kingdom.

After two weeks of travel we reached the plains. No living thing was there. The earth, however, was clad in verdure. In some mysterious manner it was evident that the germs of certain forms of vegetable life had survived. Wheat, rice, poppies, and weeds grew up together in luxurious confusion, as though sown broadcast over the land. The scene reminded me of some vast Western prairie. The croaking of frogs, heard by night, proved that, at all events, this form of amphibious life had survived the elemental crisis. Fish, too, abounded in the rivers.

It is needless to relate at length the details of our progress to the sea. In the course of six weeks we reached the seaport of Macao, on the southern coast. Here everything was wrecked, ruined, and scorched, as though subjected to a blast-furnace. Merchandise and commodities of all sorts were baked into utter desiccation. The shipping in the harbor, where it had not been absolutely wrecked or sunk, rose and fell with the pulsations of the waves, planks and timbers yawning and starting from their places. Still, this city had not experienced the same terrible fate that had befallen San Francisco. The force of the convulsion had been spent before its effects had reached this quarter of the globe, though so far as animal life was concerned the results had been identical in both cases. An iron steamer was found in the harbor which it was possible to refit, and, after several weeks' work, she was rendered seaworthy, while her engines had not suffered materially from the heat. Having stocked this vessel with fuel, from a coal-yard whose contents had been converted into excellent coke by the solar action, and a sufficient cargo of rice, also luckily found but little parched, in the month of September, about a year after the cometary crisis, the vessel, manned by this strange crew of amateur sailors, and under such singular auspices, steamed slowly out of the harbor of Macao with the determination of visiting other portions of the earth.

The vessel was called the Euphemia, and her crew numbered thirty-one, all told. The monk Dchiamdcham, as was natural, was chosen captain of the expedition, while the control of the engine-room was assigned to myself. Luckily for the first week or more we encountered no severe weather, by which time the monks had opportunity to acquire the use of their sea-legs, and to make themselves familiar with the unaccustomed duties of sailor-life. Their duties naturally consisted in keeping things clean, and attending to the furnaces rather than in seamanship, though Dchiamdcham's capacity, combined with such little instruction as I was able to offer, gradually taught them the use of the ropes and the management of the sails, (some of which we had fortunately found uninjured,) which was an essential requirement for the prosecution of our enterprise, as we could not tell when we might ever fall in with another supply of coal.

It had been a moot question in which direction we should travel after leaving Macao. Prudence had suggested to me that our wisest course would be westward, to those Asiatic countries which had presumably escaped the full effects of the elemental visitation. We accordingly steered, as nearly as I could calculate, in a southerly direction, for the Indian Archipelago, hoping sooner or later to find the Straits of Anjer or the Gilolo Passage. But the fates had decreed otherwise. For the first ten days we experienced mild and favorable weather, and our dead reckoning, as well as the increasing declination of the Pole Star, showed that we were approaching the Islands, when we encountered one of those typhoons which are of by no means rare occurrence on the China Sea. By the time that the violence of the gale was spent we had been driven far eastward, over the waters of the Pacific—how far, we had no means of ascertaining, for in the absence of a chronometer and almanac, it was impossible to approximate the longitude.

From the sun's meridian altitude, I determined that we were about twenty degrees north of the equator; also, that, judging from an estimated dead reckoning, the nearest land in our proposed course was the Sandwich Islands. The desire was strong within me to revisit California, and learn the full extent of the catastrophe I had witnessed from the balloon. Not many days after, the eastern horizon resolved itself into a long line of cloud, and I had no difficulty in recognizing the contour of the Coast Range Mountains to the south of the town of Monterey. The aspect of the beach, of the headlands, of the white surf of the bay, was perfectly familiar, and the brown appearance of plain and highland was just as might have been expected at that season of the year. The sea was destitute of ships. No sea-birds were to be seen; nor did the white and glistening houses at either extremity of the bay suggest the looks of Monterey and Santa Cruz. Instead of this, irregular ruins seemed to mark the sites of these well-known watering places. On the afternoon of the following day, we sighted the Golden Gate. It was a calm and cloudless day—such a day as, a year ago, would have called out innumerable vehicles to the ocean beach. We steamed slowly north, past the spot where the Ocean House had once been. The sudden turning of a point brought us in full view of the Cliff House, or rather the spot it had once occupied, for no building of any kind was to be seen. The outline of Seal Rock rose from the water, with the spray dashing white against its sides, but the glossy colony that had once sported there was gone. No difference was apparent in the bare and russet aspect of the bluffs overlooking the entrance to the bay. It is true that there were no signs of living vegetation visible, but that was normal for California in summer time. Our vessel steamed onward to the harbor, and came abreast of Fort Point. No fierce bombardment could have produced a spectacle of completer ruin. The fiery heat which failed to melt rocks, could nevertheless crumble mortar and cement to powder, and a shapeless pile of brick, with here and there a mass of iron showing through it, was all that remained of that solid structure once bristling with heavy ordnance. The officers' quarters and the Presidio barracks presented a similar spectacle of desolation. Alcatraz was also dismantled, while of the houses and streets which covered the hills between the Presidio and the city scarce a vestige could be seen.

At length we steamed round Black Point and came in full view of the site of the city. The destruction that had fallen upon the ponderous brick fortifications had visited with redoubled force the wooden structures which composed the bulk of the streets. Only the lines of the broadest thoroughfares were defined. Those running east and west from the wharves to the hills were indistinguishable. Piles of charred timber demonstrated the extent and intensity of the conflagration. The wharves were burned nearly to the water's edge, the tops of the piles, however, showing that the tide was lower now than at the time of the catastrophe. The shipping seemed to have shared the general fate, as not a vessel was to be seen, though the bay, with its islands and the shores lining it, looked as normal as ever.

At sundown we cast anchor in the stream about a mile from what was once the city front, Dchiamdcham and myself determining to go ashore in the morning and inspect the ruined city. After dark I was pacing the deck, when a sight from the direction of the city arrested my attention. There, in the heart of it, among the ruins, shone and twinkled a light. I mentally endeavored to locate it, and came to the conclusion that it originated in the neighborhood of Montgomery or Kearny Streets, and in the line of California or Pine. My surprise was still further increased, when I presently beheld a second, but much dimmer light, leaving the first and traveling slowly from it. Then this light stopped, shone for a few minutes, and finally disappeared. Evidently, I reasoned, those lights indicate the presence of human beings.

Accordingly, next morning, Dchiamdcham and myself left the ship's side in our only boat, and landed where the Oakland ferry depot, at the foot of Market Street, used to stand. After mooring the boat to the remnant of a pile formerly belonging to one of the slips, we clambered over the debris of the railroad offices and succeeded in gaining firm footing on the shore. The open area in front of the company's offices, where the various city cars converge to a terminus, presented a space comparatively free from debris, but the lines of all the streets running cityward, from Sacramento to Pacific, were literally choked and rendered impassable by charred and formless ruins. Market Street alone, by reason of its great breadth, was practicable for a pedestrian, though even on this wide thoroughfare, blocks of masonry from the lofty warehouses which had once adorned it, necessitated either climbing over or making a circuit around them.

We pushed on as best we could, Dchiamdcham and myself, till we reached the intersection of Montgo

Here our farther progress was arrested by a gigantic mass of masonry which had once composed the Palace Hotel. Such a pile of awful and indescribable confusion as was here witnessed in the destruction of one of the largest edifices on earth struck dismay to the soul of even the philosophical Dchiamdcham. The material of the vast rectangle had toppled over an area of at least two acres, choking not only its own proper ground, but also the surrounding thoroughfares for many yards. Masses of charred furniture and rusty iron were dispersed through the heterogeneous pile, while here and there a ghastly skeleton seemed striving to free itself from its encumbering tomb, or a fleshless skull grinned mockingly through the environment of a blackened window-sash, like a hideous painting from its frame. Even as we looked, the sudden lapse of a crumbling fragment frightened from their lairs a horde of sleek and whiskered rats, which glared at us with keen eyes, as though undecided whether to hazard an attack. Life, such as it was, had evidently survived, in some of the forms best suited to the exigencies of the case—a terrible travesty on the doctrine of the survival of the fittest.

Sick at heart and shuddering at the spectacle, we turned abruptly to the right, and groped our way as best we could down the line of Montgomery Street. Past what I recognized as some mullions from the Masonic Temple at the corner of Post Street; past the spot where once stood the Lick House; past the shapeless piles of brick and stone which once belonged to the Occidental Hotel and Russ House blocks, we neared the intersection of Pine Street. Here a peculiar sound arrested my attention. I stopped to listen. It was a regular, monotonous, dull, clinking sound. I had heard it thousands of times before, and it thrilled my soul to hear it. I clutched Dchiamdcham by the arm, and dragged him on over a pile of rubbish that lay in front of what had once been Nevada Block. As we gained the top of the pile I beheld a sight so unaccountable, so utterly at variance with my surroundings and my preconceived notions of what I might expect, that I stood transfixed and speechless. There, directly on the ruins of the Nevada Bank, I saw two men in conventional miner's garb; one sitting on a convenient block and leaning on his pick, the other standing and wielding the same implement to the sound I had already heard. An involuntary exclamation of surprise escaped me, at which the men looked up. Their astonishment was equal to our own, and mutual explanations were in order. It seemed that these men had been working on a shift in the fourteen-hundred-foot level of one of the Comstock mines on the day of the cometary catastrophe. At sunrise, when the heat became more oppressive, a signal had been given from the surface for the miners to ascend. These two men were working in an out-of-the-way drift at the time, and did not hear the signal. At noon they discovered the departure of their comrades, but could not divine the reason. Finding themselves alone in the mine, they signalled to be taken up. No notice was taken of their signal, and next day, becoming thoroughly alarmed, they had perilously climbed up the bucket-rope from level to level till they gained the surface. Nothing but corpses of the dead and ruined buildings met their gaze, nor could they account for the condition of things by any natural means. The very accident of having been forgotten in the mine saved them; for the heat there, always oppressive, had not been materially augmented at such a depth below the surface of the earth.

By the time they emerged the elemental crisis was over. Bewildered, they wandered forth to find the country ghastly with death. Instinctively they sought the mountains, and found upon the higher slopes of the Sierra Nevada a hunter's hut that had survived the melting of the everlasting snows. They discovered, too, that a few more things, like themselves, had survived what they now perceived to have been a natural convulsion, though they could not, of course, have any idea of its extent. They subsisted during the winter on roots and ground animals, which had been protected by snow. A potato patch similarly protected had luckily been found. Early in the year they struck out for San Francisco, where, in spite of the ghastly surroundings, the old mining passion seized them, and they determined to prospect the basement of the Nevada Bank, trusting to luck for the means of hereafter utilizing what they might acquire. But they could not live without food, and several months had now been expended in trips to the mountains to accomplish the result of a thriving potato patch in what had formerly been a millionaire's garden. They had scarcely commenced operations on our arrival, and immediately offered us equal shares in the recovered hulsion if we would assist them and afterward carry them off.

The extraordinary recital of these men convinced me that, after all, the destructive effects of the conflagration were not as wide-spread as, at first sight, they would seem to be. It would, however, be tedious to relate the explorations we made in this and other countries. The general result was the same, though details varied, of course, with conditions. Suffice it to say that to-day, at a distance of ten years from that disastrous day, in the summer of 1893, the earth smiles and blossoms once more, though they are the smiles and blossoms of a wilderness. Our men and our women are fewer, but they are simpler, handsomer, and bolder. Our domestic animals and our cultivated crops follow the same rule. We have no arts or sciences, for we have no use for them. Dchiamdcham and his brother monks have forsaken asceticism in view of the novel requirements of life, and though we follow no formulated religion, and have no laws, we are all good, because there is no interest in being bad.

UTOPIA, 1893.

ROBERT DUNCAN MILNE.

It may interest the readers of the above to learn that Mr. Ignatius Donnelly, the author of that ingenious and startling book "Atlantis," which appeared last year, has just written a new book entitled "Ragnarok." The title of the book is derived from the Scandinavian Sagas, or legends, and means "the darkness of the gods." The book advances the theory that the earth was once struck by a comet, and that the drift, which geologists attribute to the action of glaciers, is the result of that catastrophe; and, further, that after the contact of the comet with the earth came a succession of calamities of flood, and snow, and ice, which destroyed nearly all inhabitants. In support of his startling theory Mr. Donnelly has marshaled an immense amount of testimony of science, history, and legendary lore.

THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS.

Fettered by Fate.

"I can not marry you."

Against the mullioned windows of Brierton Villa the snow and sleet, driven with terrible force by a northeast gale, was heating fiercely, and as the wind caught up the white particles and whirled them around in eddying circles, it seemed to shriek in very glee at the destruction that strewed its path on every side. Old oaks, whose gnarled and twisted limbs had stood out bravely against the storms of centuries, howled beneath the blast, and trembled and shook like aspens in a summer breeze. To the westward lay the ocean, and above the noise of warring elements came the hoarse roar of the surf as it beat upon Dead Man's Reef. And could human eyesight have pierced the gloom that hung alike over land and wave, one might have seen great ships, stanchly built and bravely manned, tossed about on the yeasty surface of the waters as thistle-down is blown hither and yon by the zephyrs of a summer morning. Well might the mariner, as he lashed himself to a bottle of rum before going on deck, think of the cheerful fireside at home, around which clustered the bright-eyed children whose chubby arms would never again be twined around papa's neck and their little rosebud mouths be lifted to his for a kiss in case he was run over by a railroad train after getting ashore.

A wild night, indeed! And yet, as George W. Simpson stood there in the parlor of Brierton Villa, he heeded not the storm, for in his heart there was a dull pain, and on his face a look of anguish—a sort of my-other-suspender-has-broken expression that was indeed pitiful. Eulalie McGirly-girl, to win whose love he would freely have sacrificed his sister's chances for a matinee ticket, had told him that his hopes were vain; that he could never become her bonny bridegroom. Suddenly he turned to her and spoke again: "But you might at least," he said, "tell me why it is that all my rose-tinted dreams of future happiness must vanish, and I go forth to peer forever into a gloomy vista of toeless stockings and undershirts forever bereft of buttons. Surely my unswerving faith that you would hold out as long as the candy-store did, and my untiring devotion in the line of oysters, deserve a more kindly recognition than this."

"I know that all you say is true," replies the girl, choking back a sob; "and I love you better than all the world besides; but I can not, must not marry you."

But now George is by her side. "I demand to know," he says, passionately, "why it is that you will not marry me if you love me as you say you do."

Looking up to him, her brown eyes suffused with tears, and her dimpled cheeks aflame with blushes, Eulalie says, in low bitter tones:

"I have cold feet."—Chicago Tribune Novelist.

Fables.

A Chicago lady once Applied to a Learned Judge for a Divorce. "What is the Name of the Husband?" inquired the Learned Judge. "I have no Husband yet, but Inasmuch as I contemplate matrimony, I felt that I should be prepared for the Worst."

An editor once Owned three hundred Thousand dollars' worth of Railroad stock, twenty One-Thousand-Dollar Government bonds, six white Shirts, a country Residence on the Hudson, a farm in Illinois, a span of Horses and a Wagon, two suits of Clothes, and a Plug hat. This fable Teaches that all the Liars are Not Dead Yet.

A Lady stepped upon a Banana skin and Fell to the Pavement with a Dull, Sickening Thud. A hard-hearted Man, passing that Way, laughed Coldly, and refused Assistance. "Sir," exclaimed the Lady, "I have Seen enough of you to Convince me that you Are no Gentleman." "And I," retorted the Malicious man, "have Seen Enough to inspire Me with a Similar Opinion concerning yourself."

A Dog and his Tail fell into a Dispute as to which should Wag the Other. An itinerant Wasp, passing that Way, casually Remarked: "Speaking of Tails reminds me that I Possess one which May possibly be Influential enough to Wag you Both." This fable Teaches that Ten cents' worth of Dynamite is a bigger man than a Church Steeple.

A Precocious boy was once Afflicted with a Boil in that Locality of his Anatomy which is Seldom mentioned in Polite society. To him a Playmate addressed Words of Condolence. "Oh," replied the Precocious boy, "I'm not so Powerful had off, After all. This Boil has Taught me, in its Quiet, unobtrusive way, what Mantel-Pieces were Made for, as you yourself shall Learn if you will Stay and See me Eat my Supper." This fable Teaches that All created things have their Spheres to Fill in this Life.

A Person passing a Barn-yard was observed by a Mule to be in Distress. "Tell me," said the Mule, "what is the Cause of your Sorrow, that I may Sympathize with you." "Alas," said the man, "I am Dead Broke and I know not how to Mend my Fortunes." "If you will just Step inside of this Yard," remarked the Mule, in a kindly tone, "I will Try to make a Raise for You." The man Did so; and the Fact that his Hat was Found in the Adjoining State the next Day warrants the Belief that the Mule fulfilled his Pledge.

A sympathetic pawnbroker once Called upon an Afflicted Clothing Merchant to Condole with him upon the Loss of his Wife. "Moses," quoth he: "you were so Wild with Grief when I saw you Sitting by the Coffin, yesterday, that I could not Bear the Sight, but Crept away Weeping." "Were you Not by the Grave?" inquired Moses, removing the Handkerchief from his Eyes. "No," replied Abraham, "I was Not by the Grave—I was too much Broken up with Seeing you by the Coffin." "Oh," exclaimed Moses, "you Should have Been by the grave—I just raised h—ll by the grave!" This fable Teaches that the Depth of Human Sorrow is Boundless.—Denver Tribune.

There is a story told of a party of distressed mariners, who, shipwrecked on an unknown coast, journeyed inland with many fears and much trepidation until they beheld a ghbhet crowning an eminence, when they thanked God and took courage. They were sure that they were in a civilized country.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

The Grand Duke Vladimir of Russia, at present in Paris, possesses herculean strength. As an evidence of it, it is related that when he visits one of his intimate friends and does not find him at home he is accustomed, instead of leaving his card, to leave a piece of silver money, which he doubles with his fingers as easily as if it were but a bit of card-board.

Mrs. Thomas Payne is recorded as being the youngest bride in the United States, not having yet reached her teens, though tending toward them slowly. She is eleven and a half years old, and her husband is a South Carolina parson. He is probably familiar with the hymn commencing: "There is a land of pure delight." Many pious people will remember the rest of the stanza.

At a Boston dinner-party, the other evening, Mrs. Julia Ward Howe expressed emphatically her dislike and disapproval of Governor-elect Butler, and finally declared that she never would allow him to be presented to her. "But if you were at a friend's house, and she presented him, not knowing your feelings, what would you do?" asked a friend. "Oh," was the reply, "it would not be myself, but the lady's guest, who would know General Butler."

Anthony Trollope was hurried in Kensal Green. He has left three unfinished novels, two of which are running in periodicals. His total work has been fifty novels, besides other books, in thirty years. He always made it a rule the very day he finished one novel to begin another, and worked with great method. Indeed, he even left a record of the number of words contained in his works, the grand total being something tremendous. It is understood that he died possessed of very ample means.

The Sultan is despondent through the failure of his intrigue in Egypt and the iron pressure of England. He also fears assassination. He is a prey to the most fearful fits of depression, becomes frantic in his terror, and shrieks at imaginary enemies, makes and unmakes ministers in twenty-four hours, and altogether presents a pitiable spectacle. His dread of assassination has become like a perpetual nightmare. He tells every one that he will meet the fate of his brother, and if his hallucinations do not carry him off, this is quite possible.

Mrs. Stanford will reside in New York this winter. She is reputed to have the finest diamonds in that city, except Mrs. John Jacob Astor's. She improved the opportunity presented by a fashionable wedding in an up-town church the other day to show them all on her person at one time. Many ladies thought it a strange place to appear quite so brilliantly bedecked; but, perhaps, envy was quite an element in their criticisms. The lady wore a magnificent necklace of diamonds, while below it, extending from shoulder to shoulder, was a row of splendid gems four inches deep. Her ears, head, arms, and dress were ablaze with jewels.

Captain Shaw, of the London Fire Brigade, who has just returned from a visit to the States, where he has been on a tour of investigation as to fire matters, is a great friend and favorite of the Prince, and though his position as head of the Metropolitan Fire Brigade would hardly be a very high one socially, the effect of his royal patron's friendship and familiarity shows itself not only in the willing association he gets from all the young swells in the club, with whom as a man and jovial companion he is immensely popular, but in the fact that when Mrs. Shaw gives a ball other entertainments at greater houses on the same night are deserted in favor of the captain's wife, there being a predominance of men among the deserters perhaps.

Charles T. Vansant, who was killed on a Pennsylvania railroad the other evening, was the hero of one of the most gallant episodes of the late war. He bore the colors of his regiment at Ball's Bluff, and when, during a desperate charge, his colonel was shot, he bore him from the field, and then returned amid a shower of bullets to rescue the flag. Five times it was captured by the rebels, and regained by Vansant in a hand-to-hand struggle. At last he broke away with the flag and reached the river. His enemies were at his very heels, but he plunged into the water, dived to the bottom, placed the flag there under a stone, and then swam to the other shore and escaped. Afterward he revisited the spot, and succeeded in finding and restoring to the regiment the flag he had so desperately defended.

It has been rumored from time to time that Lord Ripon intended to mark his conversion to the Roman faith by restoring at least a part of Fountains Abbey. Certainly, if there is to be a revival of monastic institutions in England, it would be most desirable, from an archaeological point of view, that it should be the means of restoring some of the magnificent remains now scattered over the country. Lord Ripon is very rich, and has only one child, Lord de Grey. Fountains was part of the great estate bequeathed to his father in 1845 by a remote kinswoman, Mrs. Lawrence. In 1822, when the fall of five arches of the cloister threatened the destruction of the arcade, they were rebuilt, and the entire roof was shored up. Ten years later the tower was rebuilt, and in 1840 other important repairs were made.

A discouraging object of attack for autograph-bunters is Madame Christine Nilsson. One of the fraternity, album in hand, managed to gain access to her parlor the other day. But the moment he made his errand known, she arose in all her dignity, and, pointing to the door, exclaimed: "You go right out of that door, this instant!" And he went. However, a few days ago she yielded to an importunate applicant. Glancing through the book, she saw on the last page the inscription: "Last but not least. Adeline Patti." Seizing a pen she wrote on the inside of the cover, facing this: "Last and least. Christine Nilsson Rouzeaud." Madame Nilsson evidently does not suffer from any form of stage-fright. At her concert in Boston, when her duet with Miss Glenn was reached on the programme, she advanced alone to the footlights, and said: "Ladies and gentlemen, Miss Glenn has such a had cold that she can't sing in the duet. If you don't mind much I will sing a solo!" and then, amid much applause, announced the name of the improvised selection.

LABORERS IN HAWAII.

[EDITORS ARGONAUT: The following I wrote while in the Sandwich Islands, from facts and impressions I received during two months thorough acquaintance with the subjects referred to. I submit it to you because it tells some things which have not yet been told in regard to island matters, and because the Argonaut has evinced a determination to treat the subject fairly.]

I must say something about the laboring classes here, for whom these Islands are as near paradise as any of us may expect to get while we still labor. The natives do not work on the plantations in any considerable numbers, so the planters have been compelled to induce immigration from various other countries, while there are thousands of natives idling about. Various causes contribute to make the life and condition of the foreign laboring element here particularly favorable. In the first place, labor here is very scarce, and in great demand at from twenty-five to thirty dollars per month, including homes and food. This scarcity compels the planters to give their hands very good care, not only in the matter of food and sleeping accommodations, but also in the matter of personal treatment, in order to induce them to remain after the expiration of one contract and enter into another. Otherwise, at the expiration of his contract a laborer will accept a higher offer from a neighboring planter, and leave his old employer short-handed, and with no labor market to supply his wants from. This puts the matter of treatment of laborers upon about as simple and plain a business basis as could be imagined.

No matter what his inclinations may be, an overseer here must curb his desire to treat his men roughly, because a planter will not have an overseer who deprives him of his valuable labor. But, of course, human nature can not always be controlled by even so strong a motive as self-interest, and sometimes a hot-tempered overseer will cuff an insolent laborer—but often to regret it in more ways than one. It not only puts an overseer in bad odor with his employer, but results in his being punished by the law, invariably and severely. Of the magistrates or justices, who have jurisdiction of cases under the Master and Servant Act, twenty-three of the total number of twenty-eight are natives. There is nothing on earth that so pleases a native as an opportunity to "come down heavy" on a foreigner. Upon the slightest provocation these native justices will promptly, and with much dignity, order the arrest of a complained-of overseer, and the complaining witness need not have his testimony very carefully corroborated to secure an overseer's conviction.

Although I have known foul cases where overseers have been unjustly fined, yet I applaud the general effect of the system, as it undoubtedly prevents acts of cruelty which might occur otherwise, despite the other motives for kind treatment. These conditions, of course, put the laborers here upon a very independent footing, but there is much more in their favor. They have no care about house-rent, each married man being provided with a cottage, and single men with rooms; they have no worry about butchers' or bakers' bills, their meals being provided, cooked, and served plentifully for them. The question of what they get to eat is another matter of business policy with the planters. They are, of course, fed well, if for no other reason than the very good ones that they may work well, and, being satisfied, renew contracts. They have no care about winter coal, mere existence in this climate being at any time a luxury. In fact, nowhere have I ever seen so fortunate, contented, and well-conditioned classes of laborers as I have seen everywhere here. All of the high-priced labor, that requiring skilled mechanics about the mills and shops, or that requiring intelligent experience, is by Americans—principally Pacific-coasters—who everywhere are thriving and prosperous here. And that fact reminds me that the Pacific Coast was particularly fortunate when the United States secured a reciprocity treaty with these islands at a time when England was so anxious to secure a similar treaty in favor of British Columbia, in the interest of Victoria and the Canada Pacific Railroad. I do not think, that, as a general thing, the government at Washington shows any special solicitude for the welfare of the Pacific States, but in this Reciprocity Treaty the Pacific States were certainly greatly favored, whether intentionally or not. Looking at the bargain as it has resulted thus far, it appears to have been a pretty sharp one, even for a Yankee nation to make. In 1878 the United States was paid about $1,300,000 import duty on Hawaiian sugar; in 1881 Hawaii paid $3,735,035.49 for goods imported from the United States. Or, relinquishing, by treaty, $1,300,000 in duties the United States received $3,735,035 in trade. That, on the face of it, is a pretty good bargain, and especially nice for the San Francisco merchants, who receive most of its benefit. Yet the bargain is better than that. Without the treaty San Francisco not only would go without this great and growing trade, but the United States would go without the $1,300,000 duties. Any one who knows anything about Island affairs knows this is so; for England, at the time our treaty was made, was anxious to enter into the same bargain, as I have said, for the benefit of British Columbia. In such a case the result would have been the loss to the United States of all duties on Hawaiian sugar—which would have gone to Victoria or elsewhere—and San Francisco would have been opened out of the comfortable trade it has since built up, and an always hold and increase, with these islands.

Of course, these are not all of the benefits accruing to San Francisco by reason of the Reciprocity Treaty the Government shrewdly made. San Francisco is rapidly gaining control of the carrying trade to and from the Islands, is benefited by the money invested in the refining of Hawaiian sugars, and is otherwise greatly the gainer. E. W. T.

Mr. Whistler, the well-known London artist, not long ago at the ill-luck to be sold out by the sheriff. Away went the blue and yellow chairs, the rickety embroidered curtains, and the dainty Oriental hric-à-brac of the room which Mr. Oscar Wilde has described as "very joyous." But when he was stripped and bare the artist seized his brush and cried: "Now, to prevent this unpleasant catastrophe occurring again mean to have something strictly permanent." And thereupon he painted chairs and tables upon the walls, and flowing curtains, pictures upon easels, luxurious divans, and quaint cabinets, and thus again made of his room a "harmony in blue and gold."

AN OLD FAVORITE.

Luke.

[In the Colorado Park, 1873.]

Wot's that you're readin'—a novel? A novel—well, darn my skin! You a man grown and bearded, and bistin' such stuff ez that in—Stuff about gals and their sweethearts! No wonder you're thin ez a knife.

Look at me!—clar two hundred—and never read one in my life!

That's my opinion o' novels. And ez to their lyin' round here, They belonged to the Judge's daughter—the Judge who came up last year.

On account of his lungs, and the mountains, and the halsam o' pine and fir; And his daughter—well, she read novels, and that's what's the matter with her.

Yet she was sweet on the Judge, and stuck by him day and night, Alone in the cabin up yer—till she grew like a ghost, all white. She was only a slip of a thing, ez light and ez up and away Ez rifle-smoke blown through the woods, but she wasn't my kind—no way!

Speakin' o' gals, d'ye mind that house ez you rise the hill, A mile and a half from White's, and jist above Mattingly's mill? You do? Well, now, thar's a gal! What, you saw her? O, come now, thar quit!

She was only hede'velin' you boys, for to me she don't cotton one hit.

Now, she's what I call a gal—ez pretty and plump ez a quail; Teeth ez white ez a hound's, and they'd go through a ten-penny nail; Eyes that kin snap like a cap. So she asked to know "whar I was hid?"

She did? O, it's jist like her sass, for she's peart as a katy-did.

But what I talkin' of?—O! the Judge and his daughter—she read Novels the whole day long, and I reckon she read them abed, And sometimes she read them out loud to the Judge on the porch where he sat, And 'twas how "Lord Augustus" said this, and how "Lady Blanche" she said that.

But the sickest of all that I heerd, was a yarn they read 'bout a chap, "Leather-stocking" by name, and a hunter chock full o' the greenest o' sap;

And they asked me to hear; but I says: "Miss Mahel, not any for me;

When I likes I kin sling my own lies, and thet chap and I shouldn't agree."

Yet somehow or other she was always sayin' I brought her to mind Of folks about whom she had read, or suthin' helike of thet kind, And thar warn't no end o' the names thet she gave me thet summer up here, "Robin Hood," "Leather-stocking," "Rob Roy"—O, I tell you, the critter was queer.

And yet ef she hadn't been spiled, she was harmless enough in her way;

She could jabber in French to her dad, and they said thet she knew how to play;

And she worked me that shot-pouch up thar—which the man doesn't live ez kin use, And slippers—you see 'em down yer—ez would cradle an Injin's pap-poose.

Yet along o' them novels, you see, she was wastin' and mopin' away, And then she got shy with her tongue, and at last had nothin' to say;

And whenever I happened around, her face it was hid by a book, And it warn't until she left that she gave me ez much ez a look.

And this was the way it was: It was night when I kem up here To say to 'em all "good-bye," for I reckoned to go for deer At "sun up" the day they left. So I shook 'em all by the hand, "Cept Mahel, and she was sick, ez they gave me to understand.

But jist ez I passed the house next morning at dawn, some one, Like a little waver o' mist, got up on the hill with the sun; Miss Mahel it was, alone—all wrapped in a mantle o' lace— And she stood there straight in the road, with a touch o' the sun in her face.

And she looked me right in the eye—I'd seen suthin' like it before When I hunted a wounded doe to the edge o' the Clear Lake shore, And I had my knee on its neck, and jist was raisin' my knife When it gave me a look like that, and—well, it got off with its life.

"We are going to-day," she said, "and I thought I would say good-bye

To you in your own house, Luke—these woods and the bright blue sky!

You've always been kind to us, Luke, and papa has found you still As good as the air he breathes, and wholesome as Laurel Tree Hill.

"And we'll always think of you, Luke, as the thing we could not take away—

The halsam that dwells in the woods, the rainbow that lives in the spray.

And you'll sometimes think of me, Luke, as you know you once used to say, A rifle-smoke blown through the woods, a moment, but never to stay."

And then we shook hands. She turned, but a sudden she tottered and fell,

And I caught her sharp by the waist, and held her a minit—well, It was only a minit, you know, that ez cold and ez white she lay Ez a snowflake here on my breast, and then—well, she melted away—

And was gone. * * * And thar are her hooks; but I says not any for me,

Good enough may be for some, but them and I mightn't agree: They spiled a decent gal ez might hev made some chap a wife: And look at me!—clar two hundred—and never read one in my life!

—Bret Hart.

In the natural course of events the eleven general officers will retire from active service as follows: General Sherman, February 8, 1884; Lieutenant-General Sheridan, June, 1894; Major-General Hancock, March, 1888; Major-General Schofield, November, 1895; Major-General Pope, July, 1886; Brigadier-General Howard, June, 1895; Brigadier-General Terry, 1892; Brigadier-General Auger, August, 1885; Brigadier-General Crook, July, 1893; Brigadier-General Miles, July, 1895; Brigadier-General Mackenzie, August, 1894. This will prove interesting to the army, as the records of the ages of officers are guarded as sacredly at the War Department as if they were jewels.

Queen Victoria has been pleased to approve of the elevation to the peerage of Sir F. Beauchamp Seymour, G. C. B., by the title of Baron Alcester of Alcester, in the county of Warwick, and of Sir Garnet Wolseley, G. C. B., by the title of Baron Wolseley of Cairo, and of Wolseley, in the county of Stafford.

THE CITY OF CANALS.

A Lady's Notes in the Land of Ducks, Dykes, and Ditches.

Following the throng in the street the other day, I was insensibly led to Kalverstrat, one of the principal fashionable business streets of Amsterdam, and then to the Dam where the Royal Palace is situated. I stopped before one of its doors, where soldiers were on guard, and inquired if the palace could be seen. The answer was to lead me forthwith to the principal entrance, where a polite porter takes charge of umbrellas and other encumbrances. He begged me to be seated and await other visitors. During this short delay, I looked at the ground-floor of this building, and was impressed with its resemblance to an old Spanish convent; exactly the same entrance halls, (saguan), interior courtyards, (patio), all paved with flag-stones; stone walls, stone columns, and stone stairs, all so cold and gloomy-looking that they actually sent a cold shiver through me. The porter soon returned with a party of visitors, and we all ascended to the first floor of the royal residence, which is generally unoccupied, as the court resides at The Hague, and, when not there, the royal family inhabit a favorite country palace. The first floor of the Amsterdam palace consists of an entrance hall, ante-chamber, four or five large reception-rooms, the private and public dining-rooms, the ambassador's hall, the chapel, the queen's private drawing-room, the throne hall, considered to be of extraordinary dimensions, having no supporting columns. The floors and ceilings of all these apartments are of mosaics or white marble, the walls either of white marble with elaborate carvings and fine sculptured bas-reliefs and statues, covered with paintings of great artists, or hung with velvet, satin, or brocade of different colors to match the furniture. The chairs, of different fancy shapes, are richly embroidered, some with coats-of-arms, others with capricious designs; immense mirrors and chandeliers, bronzes, and numberless ornaments fill every room. The artistic work in these halls would take days to examine in detail. The statues represent mythological gods and goddesses; the paintings historical subjects, ancient and modern.

The ancient council chamber, which was converted into a chapel by Napoleon I., has two very remarkable paintings—representing the one the judgment of Solomon, the other Brutus sentencing his son to death. Many historical relics are pointed out to visitors—among them the identical throne on which sat William II., and trophies of flags taken from the Spaniards during the religious wars of the Dutch against Philip II. of Spain. These flags are so torn and tattered that they are preserved under glass cases. They are testimonials that do honor to the contending parties of those days, for they were gallantly won by the Dutch; they were certainly desperately defended by the Spaniards. All these halls, lighted up, and with life imparted to them by the presence of crowds of richly attired guests, must offer a gorgeous sight indeed. The upper floors of the building are not shown to visitors; so, after paying to our cicerone the half-gulden he claims for his trouble, I left, and directed my steps to the Zoological Garden. This garden is the pride of Amsterdam, and is said to surpass any other of the kind in Europe, except that of London. The grounds are beautifully laid out, the number of animals of the rarest species is very great, as also the collection of curiosities from India, China, Japan, and the islands of the Pacific Ocean. The department of stuffed animals, skeletons, petrifications, shells, minerals, etc., is very attractive to connoisseurs. Attached to the garden there is a very fine library, which contains magnificent collections of engravings.

In the evening I attended a performance at the principal theatre of the city, "The Stads Schouwburg," (City Theatre). The play was "Loose," the Dutch adaptation of Moser's last German comedy, "Reif Reiflingen," which is a sequel to that author's comedy, so well known on the American stage under the title of "The Passing Regiment." The play, the company, and acting seemed to me very indifferent, perhaps because I could not understand the dialogue, and only caught the run of the plot from a long habit of theatre-going. This theatre forms part of one of the finest buildings here. Its interior, however, is very commonplace, and only of medium size. It is built on the principle of European theatres, with its floor divided into parquet and parterre, and several tiers of boxes all around. From the very beginning of the performance I noticed that glasses of beer and lemonade were brought to the seats of spectators who called for the same. As the curtain fell on the third act, a placard, with the word "pause" painted in large letters, was put up on the prompter's box, and this was the signal for a general rushing to and fro, quickly followed by the appearance of innumerable trays with cups of coffee, tea, chocolate, cakes, candies, and other dainties, which were served out in every part of the house, even in the first boxes—of course, to those who paid for them. The curtain rose before many had finished their hot beverages, which they coolly continued to sip, and, after finishing, quietly placed on the railings of the boxes, where they remained for the rest of the evening and made the auditorium rather look like a café chantant.

Good-living and cheerfulness must be a motto with the goodly Hollanders, just as politeness and willingness to oblige are certainly their characteristic traits. Everybody seems to be forever buying or partaking of refreshments and dainties. The numberless cafés, restaurants, cake and candy shops, and ambulating venders are most liberally patronized. At the street doors of the cafés gentlemen sit leisurely smoking their cigars or pipes, and repeat their glasses of beer or cups of coffee. The meals served at restaurants are so abundant that one can serve for two persons, on a pinch for three. As to the politeness and obliging spirit of the Hollanders, I can find no words to give an adequate idea of either. In the streets, they step aside to give place to ladies, take off their hats and bid good-day to those whom they meet in halls and parlors and are not acquainted with, and on all occasions are ever ready to do any service, either to give information, do an errand, show the way, give an address, call a driver, lend a pencil, and, of course, translate any paper written in any language. A stranger can stand a minute in the street, looking fixedly and inquiringly in one direction, without somebody stepping up and talking with great deference, if anything can be done for him.

AMSTERDAM, November 21st, 1882.

SOCIETY.

The Nilsson Concerts.

The Nilsson concerts on Tuesday and Thursday evenings last drew together at the Grand Opera House the most imposing and magnificent audiences ever seen in this city; and both Mr. Abbey and Miss Nilsson boldly and frequently declare that the audience on Tuesday night was the most brilliant and most beautiful that they had ever seen in America. No one who was not present can fully realize the incomparable display of elegant toilettes, bonnets, and fair women. The ladies, it was plain to be seen, especially those who had secured front and other fashionable places for seats, had made extra efforts in the way of personal adornment, and gentlemen generally appeared in full evening attire, which is not, however, en regle, according to American authority. At concerts and other places where ladies appear in street or semi-street dress, with hats or bonnets, gentlemen should be in Prince Albert frock and light trousers. On the other hand, according to the English rule, gentlemen are always supposed to be in evening dress after dark. The supposition is that they dine in dress-coats. On Tuesday evening most of the gentlemen were gloved. This is tabooed. According to rule gentlemen should go bare-handed, and carry their gloves in their crush hats—presumably to show they have a pair. When the vice-regal party entered, it was observed that the marquis and his suite were bare-handed. Instantly the gilded youth thrust their hands beneath the seats, and proceeded to peel. In a few moments the brilliant auditorium was pleasingly diversified by a vista of large red hands.

It is fair to presume that there were few people who move, or pretend to move, in society, who were not present on the opening night. Van Ness Avenue, California Street, the Palace and Grand hotels, all sent multitudes to see and be seen. Dilettanti from the Bohemian Club, millionaires from the Pacific Club, and bald heads from the Union Club, were out in force, as were also the young society pillars from the banks, commission houses, and insurance companies. When we state that Mrs. Henry Schmiedel, Mrs. James Robinson, Mrs. Rutherford, Mrs. Hooker, Mrs. Adam Grant, Mrs. Charles McLaughlin, Mrs. Hovey, Mrs. James G. Fair, Mrs. McMullin, Mrs. Thomas K. Breeze, Miss Lulu Dearborn, Miss Nellie Wood, Miss Nellie Trowbridge, Miss Dunphy, Mrs. Rebecca McMullin, and a great many other notably handsome and stylish ladies were present, we present perfect evidences that Mr. Abbey and Miss Nilsson were entirely correct in their statements regarding the character of the audience. Among the many others who graced the occasion with their presence there were:

Mr. and Mrs. Flood and Miss Flood, in a proscenium box; also J. M. Nougues and Mrs. Kallston; Mrs. Henry Newton and Miss Sedgwick with Mrs. Robinson; Mr. and Mrs. W. T. Coleman; Mrs. John Parrott, and Mrs. Maria Coleman. In the mezzanine boxes were Mr. and Mrs. Dan Yost, Henry Janin and ladies, Mr. and Mrs. Lugsden, Mrs. W. G. Hohart, Mr. and Mrs. Easton, Mr. and Mrs. Charles E. Greene, Mr. and Mrs. N. G. Kittle, Mrs. Gros, and Mr. and Mrs. John Yost. Scattered elsewhere throughout the audience were such well-known or distinguished persons as General and Mrs. Barnes, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Wetherbee, Mrs. Requa and Miss Requa, Governor Perkins and family, Ex-Mayor Alvord and ladies, Louis Sloss and family, Robert Morrow and ladies, D. Bachman, Charles Wehler Howard, Louis T. Haggin, Mr. and Mrs. A. S. Tubbs and family, Capt. N. T. Smith, T. J. Bergin, J. P. Hogue, C. Felton and ladies, Mr. and Mrs. Jarboe, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel M. Wilson, Mr. and Mrs. Russ Wilson, Mr. and Mrs. Drury Melone, Mr. and Mrs. Rheinhardt, Mr. and Mrs. Loomis, Mrs. General McDowell, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Austin, Mrs. Frank M. Pixley and Miss Van Reynege, Mr. Jerome Hart, Mr. and Mrs. H. V. Dodge, Mr. and Mrs. S. F. Thorn, Colonel and Mrs. Fry, Doctor and Mrs. McNulty, Judge Shafter and Miss Shafter, Governor Low and daughter, Miss Hammond, Mrs. Barnard, Mr. and Mrs. Wiltshire, Madame Berton, Mr. and Mrs. Gilson, Senator Fair, Mrs. Johnson and daughter, Mrs. Keeney, Mr. and Mrs. Colonel Donahue, Miss Carrie Gwin, Miss Evan J. Coleman, Mrs. Head and daughter, Miss Rice, Miss Florence Atherton, Mrs. Howard, Mr. and Mrs. Glass, Mr. and Mrs. Johnson, Mr. and Mrs. Babcock, Major and Mrs. Rathbone, Mr. and Mrs. Thornton, General and Mrs. Kautz, Miss Mills, of Menlo; Mr. and Mrs. Kohl and daughter, of San Mateo; Captain and Mrs. Boyd, of the Navy Yard; Mr. and Mrs. Mizner and Miss Mizner, of Benicia; Hon. Horace Davis and Mrs. Davis, Mr. and Mrs. A. G. Hawes and Miss Hawes and Miss Tolsen, Mrs. Jewett, Chief Engineer Davids, from the Navy Yard; Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Marks, Seth Cook and niece, Samuel D. Mayer, Mr. and Mrs. Morris, Mr. and Mrs. W. Lane Booker, Mr. and Mrs. Mason, Mr. and Mrs. L. J. Rose, of Los Angeles, Mr. Raoul Martinez, Mr. Morris Bates, Mr. H. J. Brady, Mr. E. W. Haldan, Mr. Ward McAllister, Mr. Morgan Donahue, Mr. Otto Hein, U. S. A., and a countless host of other young gentlemen.

The Eyre Tea.

DEAR MINNIE: The event of last week was the tea of Mrs. Eyre, which took place on Saturday afternoon, from three to seven. Everything was as it should be. The house was brilliantly lighted, and artistically decorated with garlands of smilax, interspersed with the choicest of flowers. The tea-table was set in the library, and was presided over by Miss Perry, the sister of the hostess. In the centre of the table was an oblong silver ornament, which surrounded a mirror, on the face of which lay camellias of various colors, and in the centre was a large floral teapot composed of exquisite blossoms. The china was of the rarest varieties, and the refreshments consisted of tea, coffee, sandwiches, cakes, and bon-bons. Ballenberg's band played for the dancers. Why is it that dancing must always accompany music? Is it because the music is in the feet as well as the head? I am not a wall-flower, and certainly am not a crabbed old maid, yet I must have my say; and, dearly as I love dancing, I do think that it should be confined to smaller assemblies, and such entertainments as teas should only be musical and conversational. Every one seemed to enjoy the ever-changing throng, and I think even "Flaneur" would have been happy had he attended this special tea, and not being a man, I can not agree with him that all teas are "hones and bugbears." Among the many familiar faces I noticed Mrs. Tevis, Mrs. Flood and daughter, Mrs. Fall, the Misses Thornton, Mrs. McDowell and daughter, Mrs. Coleman, Miss Gwin, Mrs. William Howard, Mrs. James Coleman, Miss Stone, Mrs. Pixley, Mrs. Low—who, by the way, is handsomer than in bygone days—Miss Mizner, the Misses Hutchinson, the Misses Blanding, Mrs. Laurence Poole, Mrs. Torbert and her beautiful daughter, Mrs. and Miss Myers, Mrs. Poett, Mrs. McKinstry, Mrs. Jarboe, Mrs. Harlan, and a host of others, all well known. There were many married gentlemen as well as bachelors present. The toilets were of the richest—some very elaborate, and others conspicuous from their plainness, yet all of the most exquisite taste—and I am happy to say that, with but one or two exceptions, all were short. The hostess was attired in a heavy garnet richly embroidered in colors; and of her charming daughters, one was in pink and the other in blue. EDITH.

Movements of the Princess.

On Sunday morning last, the 10th instant, the Princess Louise, accompanied by her husband, the Marquis of Lorne, Colonel De Winton, the Misses Harvey and McNeill, and other members of the vice-regal party, arrived in this city on her return from Victoria. The Comus, which brought the distinguished party, dropped her anchor at a point in the bay near Goat Island, and in a few moments thereafter Consul Booker and Colonel Tourtelotte came along side in the General McPherson, and at once transferred the princess and party to the latter vessel, and sailed for the city. Arriving here they were driven to the Palace, where the same apartments were given them as before. On Tuesday the party went to Menlo Park and Palo Alto, and in the evening occupied a box at the Nilsson concert. On Wednesday the princess dined Madame Nilsson at the Palace, and on Thursday evening the vice-regal party again visited the Grand Opera House. Yesterday the Princess departed for Monterey, apartments having been secured for her at the Hotel Del Monte the day before. She will remain here over Sunday, and some time next week go to Santa Barbara, to spend several weeks. She had intended to go either to Los Angeles or the Sierra Madre Villa, but could not secure apartments at any of the hotels at those places.

Notes and Gossip.

Morris Bates sails for Australia to-day, on a pleasure-trip, to be gone three months. Mrs. Captain W. H. Moor, who left San Francisco some two months ago, to spend the winter in New York, has been visiting Washington lately with Miss Julia Hartshorne, eldest daughter of Ben Hartshorne, formerly of this city. Commodore Stephen B. Luce, and Chief-Engineer Charles H. Loring, U. S. N., arrived here from the East on Wednesday last, the thirteenth instant. Mr. A. B. Mullet, the distinguished architect, also arrived in San Francisco from the East on Wednesday last. Mrs. Green, mother of Charles E. Green, of San Rafael, leaves Washington to-day on a visit to her son and Mrs. Green. Mrs. J. P. Stearns, of Santa Barbara, is visiting in this city. Mrs. Frank Shay returned from Los Angeles on Sunday last. Assistant-Engineer Charles G. Talcott, U. S. N., arrived here from Washington on Wednesday last. Lieutenant Abner H. Merrill, First Artillery, U. S. A., arrived here from the East on Sunday last. Mrs. Bradley, wife of Lieutenant Thomas H. Bradley, of the Twenty-first Infantry, U. S. A., arrived here from Washington on the thirteenth instant. Mr. and Mrs. William Pridham, of Los Angeles, are visiting in this city. Colonel James Zabriske, formerly of the army, but now U. S. District-Attorney of Arizona, who has been visiting relatives and friends in this city and at Carson, Nevada, during the past two or three weeks, departed on Sunday last for Washington. Mrs. George Hearst will soon leave New York for San Francisco. Miss Lillian Waters will leave on or about the first of January for Washington, where she will tarry quite a while. Miss Georgie Wilburn, of Sacramento, who has been visiting friends in this city, has returned to her home. Miss Ella L. Smith, also of Sacramento, who has been visiting the Misses Crocker, returned to her home on Sunday last. Miss Platt has arrived at her new home in Rochester, New York. Miss Fannie L. Gibbons, of Alameda, is visiting friends in New York. Miss Mizner has returned to Benicia. The Rev. John Hemphill preached his farewell sermon on Sunday last to a very large congregation; the departure of Mrs. Hemphill from this city will be a society loss, for she is a very charming and agreeable woman. Colonel Judd, of Honolulu, arrived here on Thursday last, the fourteenth instant. The concert at Mills Seminary last evening was a pronounced success. Miss Pratt, of Oakland, has returned home from Monterey. Mrs. Requa and her very beautiful daughter, Miss Laura Requa, of Fruit Vale, have come to San Francisco to stay during the winter. Miss Daisy Van Voorhies, of Sacramento, has been spending the present week in Los Angeles. Mr. Bowles E. Taney, a relative of the late Chief-Justice Taney, and Miss Harriet Scott, of Los Angeles, were married in that city on the eighth instant, by the Rev. Elias Birdsall, formerly of Trinity Church in this city. Charlie Low, Chris. Froelich Jr., Bob Graves, Mr. and Mrs. Daniel O'Connell, and Bartley Campbell, went to Monterey on Saturday last and tarried over Sunday. Mrs. E. B. Crocker and Miss Amy Crocker, of Sacramento, have been spending a few days since Friday last at Monterey. Mrs. Ruford, wife of Lieutenant-Commander Ruford, U. S. N., has gone East. Alfred Borel and family have taken up their residence in this city for the winter. Edgar Mills and Miss Mills, his daughter, of Menlo Park, have gone to New York to stay until March or April next. Lieutenant W. H. Miller, U. S. A., and Mrs. Miller, who left here on Saturday last, are in Los Angeles. The death of Rear-Admiral Wyman, U. S. N., promotes Commodore Edmund C. Colhoun, late Commandant at the Mare Island Navy Yard, to the position of Rear-Admiral; no other promotions are caused thereby, as it requires two vacancies in each grade to make one promotion. Mrs. Andrew McCreery has taken up her residence in Washington, and drives over the avenues with the handsomest pair of ponies ever seen at the capital. The regular monthly social of the Olympic Club, which took place last evening, was, like the preceding one, a very delightful affair. The officers of the Navy Yard gave a dancing party at the chapel at the chapel at the yard last evening. Mrs. Crocker and the Misses Crocker went to Monterey a few days ago to stay a short time. Governor-elect Stoneman is expected in Sacramento during the coming week. Colonel Charles F. Crocker and his brother George, who left here on the fourth instant for the end of the Southern Pacific railroad, were met at that point by their father on Sunday last, and the party returned to this city yesterday. Charles Miller, accompanied by his daughter, Miss Mary Miller, have returned; Miss Miller, it will be remembered, was one of the bridesmaids at the Hopkins-Crittenden wedding. Mr. and Mrs. L. J. Rose, of San Gabriel, are at the Palace. Colonel A. G. Hawes and Frank Unger returned from New York last week. In New York City, November 27th, Miss Emma, daughter of Captain Thomas Fallon, U. S. A., of San Francisco, was united in marriage to Mr. X. Eugene Burns, of Baltimore, son of the late Captain Owen Burns, U. S. N. The ceremony was performed by Reverend Father White at St. Xavier Church. The bride was robed in white satin, trimmed with duchesse lace, and was attended by Miss Lillie Burns, sister of the groom; while Mr. Marion Hargiss served as best man. Miss Fallon was educated in Europe, and is noted for her beauty and talents. From the church the party attended a splendid reception at the Fifth Avenue Hotel, and afterward witnessed Mrs. Langury's first performance in "The Honey-moon." Mrs. Mark Sibley Severance, who has been visiting in the Eastern and Southern States for several months past, returned home yesterday. Mrs. Charles McLaughlin has issued invitations for a party which she will give at the Palace Hotel on Thursday evening next, the 21st instant. Mr. and Mrs. Adams, of Oakland, gave an elegant reception at their residence on Telegraph Avenue on Thursday evening last. Mr. and Mrs. Charles Ellis, of Los Angeles, have been at the Occidental for several weeks. Mrs. Jarboe has sent out invitations for a reception at her residence on Tuesday, the 26th instant. Mrs. Samuel D. Mayer is being entertained in Paris by her friend, Madame Roosevelt Scovell.

Mr. Carter, late Prime Minister of the Hawaiian Kingdom, is at the Grand Hotel with his daughter, on their way to the Sandwich Islands. Mr. Carter has been absent in Europe for the last year upon a diplomatic mission to France and Portugal, negotiating in reference to affairs touching the Island Kingdom.

LONGFELLOW'S POSTHUMOUS DRAMA.

Michael Angelo.
MEDICATION.

Nothing that is shall perish utterly,
But perish only to revive again
In other forms, as clouds restore in rain
The exhalations of the land and sea.
Men build their houses from the masonry
Of ruined tombs; the passion and the pain
Of hearts, that long have ceased to beat, remain
To throb in hearts that are, or are to be.
So from old chronicles, where sleep in dust
Names that once filled the world with trumpet tones,
I build this verse; and flowers of song have thrust
Their roots among the loose disjointed stones,
Which to this end I fashion as I must.
Quickened are they that touch the Prophet's bones.

MONOLOGUE.

MICHAEL ANGELO'S studio. He is at work on the cartoon of the Last Judgment.

MICHAEL ANGELO.

Why did the Pope and his ten Cardinals
Come here to lay this heavy task upon me?
Were not the paintings on the Sistine ceiling
Enough for them? They saw the Hebrew leader
Waiting, and clutching his tempestuous beard,
But heeded not. The bones of Julius Shook in their sepulchre. I heard the sound;
They only heard the sound of their own voices.
Are there no other artists here in Rome
To do this work, that they must needs seek me?
Fra Bastian, my Fra Bastian, might have done it;
But he is lost to art. The Papal Seals,
Like leaden weights upon a dead man's eyes,
Press down his lids; and so the burden falls
On Michael Angelo, Chief Architect
And Painter of the Apostolic Palace.
That is the title they cajole me with,
To make me do their work and leave my own;
But having once begun, I turn not back.
Blow, ye bright angels, on your golden trumpets,
To the four corners of the earth, and wake
The dead to judgment! Ye recording angels,
Open your books and read! Ye dead, awake!
Rise from your graves, drowsy and drugged with death,
As men who suddenly aroused from sleep
Look round amazed, and know not where they are!
In happy hours, when the imagination
Wakes like a wind at midnight, and the soul
Trembles in all its leaves, it is a joy
To be uplifted on its wings, and listen
To the prophetic voices in the air
That call us onward. Then the work we do
Is a delight, and the obedient hand
Never grows weary. But how different is it
In the disconsolate, discouraged hours,
When all the wisdom of the world appears
As trivial as the gossip of a nurse
In a sick-room, and all our work seems useless.
What is it guides my hand, what thoughts possess me,
That I have drawn her face among the angels,
Where she will be hereafter? O sweet dreams,
That through the vacant chambers of my heart
Walk in the silence, as familiar phantoms
Frequent an ancient house, what will ye with me?
'Tis said that Emperors write their names in green
When under age, but when of age in purple.
So Love, the greatest Emperor of them all,
Writes his in green at first, but afterwards
In the imperial purple of his blood.
First love or last love which of these two passions
Is more omnipotent? Which is more fair,
The star of morning or the evening star?
The sunrise or the sunset of the heart?
The hour when we look forth to the unknown,
And the advancing day consumes the shadows,
Or that when all the landscape of our lives
Lies stretched behind us, and familiar places
Gleam in the distance, and sweet memories
Rise like a tender haze and magnify
The objects we behold, that soon must vanish?
What matters it to me whose countenance
Is like Laocoon's full of pain; whose forehead
Is a plowed harvest-field, where threescore years
Have sown in sorrow and have reaped in anguish;
To me, the artisan, to whom all women
Have been as if they were not, or at most
A sudden rust of pigeons in the air,
A flutter of wings, a sound, and then a silence?
I am too old for love; I am too old
To flatter and delude myself with visions
Of never-ending friendship with fair women,
Imaginations, fantasies, illusions,
In which the things that can not be take shape,
And seem to be, and for the moment are.

(Convent bells ring.)

Distant and near, and low, and loud the bells,
Dominican, Benedictine, and Franciscan,
Jangle and wrangle in their airy towers
Dissonant as the brotherhoods themselves
In their dim cloisters. The descending sun
Seems to caress the city that he loves,
And crowns it with the aureole of a saint.
I will go forth and breathe the air a while.

—Atlantic Monthly for January.

There is a movement on foot to make the study of Spanish a part of the regular public school course, instead of, as at present, teaching it in the evening schools. The Argonaut has never advocated the teaching of foreign languages in the public schools, but if the public moneys are to be expended in this direction, it is a great deal better to lay them out on Spanish than on French or German. These two latter tongues can only figure as accomplishments, while Spanish, considering our trade relations with Mexico and other Spanish-speaking countries to the south of us, will be of use to young men in business houses and counting-rooms.

Julian Rix had three black-and-white studies at the recent exhibition of the Salmagundi Sketch Club: "Morning on the Passaic," "Chinatown, San Francisco," and "Point of Pines, Monterey."

Girls who enter the English postal service receive a salary of two dollars and fifty cents per week. The outlook for the future husbands of these girls is indeed a sad one.

Mistress—"Were you baptized, Kezoah, when you were named?" Maid—"Law, ma'am, we don't baptize in our church; we immerge."

OLLA-PODRIDA.

Plagiarism is regarded by the lesser men and women of the literary world as a most heinous crime. It was Coleridge who said, "Plagiarists are always suspicious of being stolen from." We have been revolving this matter in our minds for some time, in the hope of accommodating our conscience to the "act of appropriating the ideas or the language of another and passing them off as our own," for this is the definition of the offense we are endeavoring to excuse—that is, find excuse for committing. We have, and so has the whole intellectual world, overcome the scruple of stealing the ideas of others, and we are now only paltering over the commission of the lesser theft—viz., the language. There are no original ideas. These were exhausted by the early thinkers and early writers. Ideas are like exhausted placers—the ground is first picked over for nuggets, then worked for the coarser lumps, then "long-tom'd" for the dust, then ground-sluiced for the fine dust, and then put through the quicksilver process, till there is no longer any valuable idea undiscovered. They have all been appropriated and coined into expression a thousand times; re-coined into new expressions; cast into solid prose for use, and into fantastic imagery for poetical conceptions. Solomon said so, and before Solomon the placers and deep-diggings of original thought were undoubtedly well worked over and nearly exhausted. It is a part of the Platonic philosophy that "ideas" were the patterns according to which the Deity fashioned the world; and Milton writes:

"Thence to behold this new created world,
The addition of his empire, how it showed
In prospect from his throne, how good, how fair,
Answering his great idea."

One who has read Shakespeare, Bacon, Rabelais, Milton, Dante, Goethe, and Cervantes, will recognize the fact that there is nothing new under the sun. It is said that there are no new jokes; that Joe Miller is but the reproduction of a long line of joking Millers, who go back to the time when, on the banks of the Euphrates or Tigris, or in the hanging gardens of Babylon, they told their jokes to the Moon-god; that there is nothing new in religion; that Buddha and Christ are but the younger generations of the line of deities which runs back to invisible ages; that the cross and the Christian symbols are but the types of heathen creeds; and that the enigmatic hieroglyphics written on pottery and papyrus, and carved on Assyrian tombs, are but rude attempts to preserve traditions which had been handed down in song, story, and priestly homily during long, long ages of time. If it is not wrong to steal ideas—as assuredly it is not—then why is it wrong to steal the language in which they are clothed? Why, in quoting the sublime poetry of Job, the splendid imagery of Milton, the gorgeous language of Shakespeare, or the sweet, rhythmic harmony of our own incomparable Longfellow, should we be compelled to erect the typographical sign-board, giving notice, as thus,—"that it is not original. Of course the scholar knows that we quote; and shall we respect the feelings of the one who does not know, or shall we pay him who knows the poor compliment of assuming that he does not know? Why may we who write not be allowed to dip into the great ocean of literature and ladle out our quotations without saying this is from Lord Bacon, and that from the gossip, Pepsy; this line is from Butler's "Hudibras," and that from Victor Hugo's "Les Misérables." The artist who hurls in colored mosaics a gorgeous picture from the rocks is not required to say: This is from the Parian quarry, and that from the ruined walls of the crumbling Coliseum, or the hurried ruins of Cæsar's palace. He simply puts them together, blending their beautiful colors with nice workmanship and hiding the seams. At the bottom he writes his name, the architect of the new creation. Since early fable was modeled on fables that had gone before, and early history was but the reproduction of an historic past; as ancient religion was but the copy of religions more ancient, and modern religions but the copy of the ancient; as all ideas, thoughts, hooks, writings in prose or poetry, jokes, fiction, and incident, are but the recreation and rearrangement of the old ones, then why, when we make our "Olla-Podrida" of literary hodge-podge—why should we be compelled to credit? People steal from us, and we are not dead. A Georgia paper last week paid us the compliment of stealing an editorial. We thank them for it. We often feel like stealing an editorial from George William Curtis. Why should we not? It would enrich us and not make him poor. It would improve all our San Francisco daily, weekly, and monthly journals. Instead of the dreary original matter of Upton, Bartlett, Young, Seabough, Boruck, Nesfield, Wentworth, Bierce, O'Connell, Bunker, Jackson, and our other writers, the poor barren language, in which, with cowardly effort, they endeavor to cover up borrowed ideas in diction of their own, would be exchanged for the richer vestments of more highly cultured minds. For one of the Bulletin's homilies on the Spring Valley Water Company, let us read how the water came down from Loreto. If the Chronicle would choke Samuel Seabough, Esq., off from an elaborate denunciation of the Central Pacific Railroad and the railroad-builders, give us extracts from Pliny and Herodotus, tell us about the Appian Way and the old English Roman road, or give us Cicero's oration against Catiline, it would make the Chronicle more interesting, and, if it would cram itself with quotations from Rabelais and Paul de Kock, would be a more respectable family paper than it is with its statements of the nasty details of every nasty incident that occurs among us.

There is a grave question behind this hadinage. Has the writer, who prints and sells, any retained property in his work after it has gone through the commercial process, and is turned out upon the world for coin? Is it not then common property? Is it not a patented invention whose time has run? If Howells gives us an amusing narrative of the incidents in a sleeping-car, or Mark Twain forges a joke from the smithy of his brain, or Bret Harte retouches with fantastic genius the stories of our mining saloons and cabins, shall these be hid in book or magazine, and never be read, except by those who purchase? This is a practical question to the readers of the Argonaut—those who pay us four dollars for a year's subscription, and who perhaps take no magazine or literary journal from the East or Europe. Shall we, in looking through all the periodicals, be warned off by the notice, "Entered according to Act of Congress," and refuse to make quotations or extracts, or, if not too long, bodily appropriate and print?—giving credit, of course. We have resolved to give our readers, our pockets, and our conscience the benefit of the doubt, and steal. We are but the fleas of greater fleas. We but take from those who have all their lives been flying the flag of the death-head and cross-bones over the low black schooner of literary piracy, who have been dodging all their lives in and out from under the shadow of the Isle of Pines. They all do it. Sir Walter Scott made the naive admission when, in describing the old library at Oshaldistone Hall, he said: "It was a gloomy room whose antique 'oaken shelves bent beneath the weight of the ponderous folios 'so dear to the seventeenth century, from which, under favor 'be it spoken, we have distilled matter for our quartos and 'octavos, and which, once more subjected to the same alchemy, may, should our sons be yet more frivolous than our 'selves, be still further reduced into duodecimos and pamphlets." And thus the Argonaut excuses itself for going into the distillery business. In fear of it not being original, let no one make the joke and call the Argonaut an illicit distillery.

All of this grave and gay discussion has come upon us after reading the lectures of the Reverend Thomas Starr King. We were always sorry that Starr King was a reverend. We found so many things to quote, so many that we would like to use without the quartet of informing commas; so many things that we would like to palm off upon our unsuspecting readers as original; so many great, broad, comprehensive, generous ideas in both sermons and lectures; and so many beautiful pictures in words, which, with a little change, we could hang upon the columns of our journal to give it value and interest and ourselves a literary reputation. We make no apology for this disposition to take things that do not belong to us, for we believe in the doctrine of original sin—wonder if there is an original sin!—and total depravity. The first thing the infant does is to close its little red fist upon something that does not belong to it. It will clutch a silver spoon instinctively, and, if it has nothing else to steal, will grasp its own toes. But we reflected that, as Mr. King had been dead only eighteen years, and many of our readers were members of his congregation and many more had heard his lectures, we were afraid of detection—or, rather, of exposure—for if there is anything the literary hawk delights in it is to pounce down upon some mousing owl that it has caught in flagrante delicto, with an uncredited quotation in his writings. We had intended to reproduce a column or two of elegant extracts from Starr King, with such commentaries as might suggest themselves. Here, for instance: "The invisible law of gravitation, however, without any fulcrum or purchase, does lift the globe, and make it waltz, too, with its blonde lunar partner twelve hundred miles a minute to the music of the sun—ay, and heaves sun and systems and milky way in majestic cotillions on its ethereal floor." And there are preachers who think it wicked to dance. If the Universe of God becomes a dancing-hall for whirling worlds to spin in harmony to the accompaniment of the grand orchestral music of the spheres, how long a period of punishment ought to be assigned in the future world to the young fellow who seizes the lithe form of a beautiful girl, and shakes her toes to the melody of harp and fiddle in the mazy waltz? This for a simile: "All the peculiarities of rock and glass, diamond, ice, and crystal, are due to the working of unseen military forces that employ themselves under ground—in caverns, beneath ruins, in mountain crypts, and through the coldest nights, drilling companies of atoms into crystalline battalions and squares, and every carcase of fantastic order." We thought of Major-General Dimond and the California militia, of the late Third Regiment of Irish and their colonel, and were going to invoke a comparison between the mysterious forces of Nature, marshaled into order, and the fantastic manipulations and marchings of the McMahon, Emmet, and the Wolf Tone Guards. We refrain, because the Irish are so sensitive that they will not submit to being compared to even the most perfect of divine creations, and because we had determined to write one article that should rigidly exclude all mention of his Holiness, the Pope, or any reference to the Irish. Then, again, the following, for thought and beauty of expression: "Why is a lily woven out in one place and a dahlia in another; a grape vine here and a honeysuckle there; the orange in Italy, the palm in Egypt, the olive in Greece, and the pine in Maine. We have outgrown the charming fancy of the Greeks, that every tree has its Dryad, that lives in it, animates it, and dies when the tree withers. Look at the full-sized oak—the rooted leviathan of the field. Judging by your senses and by the scales, you would say that the substance of the noble tree was its hulk of bark, and hough, and branch, and leaves, and sap, the cords of woody and moist matter that compose and make it heavy. But really its substance is that which makes it an oak, that which weaves its bark and glues it to the stem, and wraps its rings of fresh wood around the trunk every year, and pushes out its houghs, and clothes its twigs with digestive leaves, and sucks up nutriment from the soil continually, and makes the roots clench the ground with their fibrous fingers as a purchase against the storm and wind, and at last holds aloft its tons of matter against the constant tug and wrath of gravitation, and swings its Briarean arms over the globe and in defiance of the gale. Were it not for this energetic essence that crouches in the acorn and stretches its limbs every year, there would be no oak; the matter that clothes it would enjoy its stupid slumber; and when the forest monarch stands up in his sinewy, lordliest pride, let the pervading life-power and its vassal forces, that weigh nothing at all, be annihilated, and the whole structure would wither in a second to inorganic dust. So every gigantic fact in nature is the index and vesture of a gigantic force." We must content ourselves with just one more quotation, and this we select that our readers and the readers of the Bulletin may note the difference between the writings of genius and mediocrity, when treating of so practical a theme as the water question. First, let our readers recall the Bulletin for the last three years on the question of water-rates and supervisor-rings in reference to the Spring Valley Water Company, and then read this: "Just think how much expenditure of mechanical strength is necessary to water a city in the hot summer months. What perspiring and tugging, and wearisome trudging of horses with the great sprinklers over tedious pavements! But see with what beautiful and noiseless force nature waters the cities! The sun looks steadily on the ocean, and its beams lift lakes of water into the air, tossing it up thousands of feet with their delicate fingers, and carefully picking every grain of salt from it before they let it go. No granite reservoirs are needed to hold in the Cochituate and Crotons of the atmosphere, but the soft outlines of the clouds hem in the vast might of the upper tides that are to cool the globe, and the winds harness themselves as steeds to these silken caldrons, and hurry them along through space, while they disburse their rivers of moisture from their great height so lightly that seldom a violet is crushed by the rudeness with which the stream descends." What a pity it is that Starr King was a reverend; that his influence was limited to a congregation and to a locality; that his genius and his intellect were prescribed by a circle that was less than that of the great circumference of the English-speaking tongue. What a pity it always is that such men should be hedged around by any conditions. What a pity that the Reverend Starr King could not have been spared to a long life; to see the end of the war and the emancipation of the slaves; to rejoice in the preservation of the Union and the extension of the area of human freedom. What a pity that he could not have established and edited the Argonaut, and permitted its present editor to go to the country and plow. And yet Starr King did magnificent service in his time and place. He helped to keep our State in the orbit of its allegiance. He helped to educate our people up to the full status of manly loyalty. He planted seeds that are ripening to annual harvests, and again planting themselves for volunteer crops of hounteous plenty, and yet he was only a preacher.

OBSCURE INTIMATIONS.

"A Subscriber."—To your request, "Will you be kind enough to give some short and clear rules, accompanied by examples, for the correct use of the subjunctive mood?" we are obliged to give a mild but firm refusal. We have known but two men who professed entire familiarity with the subjunctive mood. The first used the phrase, "If I were be," continually, and finally became a victim of melancholia, and went to the insane asylum. The other subjunctive fiend sunk lower and lower, finally wrote a grammar, and died abhorred by all who knew him.

"Miss I. W." writes: Would you please publish the following poem? It was copied from a paper years ago. You would thus much oblige several of your readers:

THE SUN-DIAL.

"Horas non numero nisi serenas."

"I note not the hours except they be bright."

"The sun, when it shines in a clear, cloudless sky,

Marks the time on my disk in figures of light.

If clouds gather o'er me, unheeded they fly,

"I note not the hours except they be bright."

"So, when I review all the scenes that have passed

Between me and thee, be they dark, be they light,

I forget what was dark, the light I hold fast—

"I note not the hours except they be bright."

The poem may have appeared in an old newspaper, but it was originally written in a Washington lady's album, in March, 1845, by Professor Samuel F. B. Morse. The motto is a common one on European sun-dials; Morse saw it at Worms. Leigh Hunt also copied it from a sun-dial at Venice. It might be more musically translated "I number none but the sunny bours." There is a poem with this refrain, and E. C. Stedman has written one on the same subject. If any reader possesses a copy of both, or either, or of the one, if there be but one, we should be pleased to publish the verses.

"S. A." writes us as follows:

EDITORS ARGONAUT: Some time since you commented unfavorably on the Tivoli and Winter Garden places of amusement for "our girls." Do you think the California "Siberia," as now presented, is any better? I am passionately fond of beauty in form, color, and motion; I confess to almost a masculine admiration for a beautiful woman. But to my thinking, there is little beauty and much vulgarity in a ballet dance. What can any modest, respectable woman see in that dancing to admire? And yet their eager eyes, even when words are left unspoken, testify to their admiration. Same old, same old! The essential characteristics are absurd. What could be more ugly and unmeaning than a picture of Cornelia, for example, poised on one toe with the other leg at some impossible angle to the body? As an exercise of skill, it may be remarkable, but it is neither a beautiful nor an edifying spectacle. (Can there be any excuse for two fat, rouged, old women appearing before an audience in costumes that show every line of their obese forms; and then, not contented with that display, elevating their feet to heights that make visible the tops of their thighs? To be sure, only two of the dancers wore that peculiar style of no-costume, still there was not in the entire troupe one whose costume did not make a burlesque of woman's form. If the influence of that sort of show, given in respectable theatres, patronized by reputable people, is not as bad as that produced by Americanized beer-gardens, I am in fault. What puzzles me most is, not why women allow their daughters to go, but what they themselves see in the spectacle to enjoy.

There is something wrong with the reasoning here. What harm can it do a lot of women to see the tops of a lot of other women's thighs? What is there in the display of the female form to bring a blush to young girls' cheeks? And if "S. A." is exercised about the young men, the fact that, as she states, the women in the ballet are old, ugly, and obese, would seem to render them innocuous to the most modest youth.

Seriously, "S. A." you are away off. To those who admire the ballet, the mere question of a display of the female figure does not occur. Those who admire a mere display of the female figure are not, as a rule, fond of the ballet. They go elsewhere for their amusement. It is a peculiar fact that to be thoroughly lascivious the woman must wear much more drapery than does the ballet dancer. True, it requires disarrangement. Yet still it is so. Witness the variety theatres. Witness also the ghost of the Jardin Mabille.

Apropos of the communication in last week's paper headed "The Argonaut Criticised," a correspondent writes:

EDITORS ARGONAUT: I noticed in this week's paper an article headed "The Argonaut Criticised," concerning which I should like to say something. I do not agree with the writer in his statement, that "what the Argonaut needs most is original 'poetry'." What original "poetry" you print is, as a rule, bad, and I am pleased to see that of late you do not print as much as you used to do. What do your readers care for the metrical vaticinations of Miss Gush or Master Slobber? Their commonplace ideas, put into lame metre, halting lines, and slipshod rhymes, are about the worst stuff you could use to fill up with. When you want to print poetry, give us poetry. Your column of "Old Favorites" is an excellent idea, and the poems are generally well selected. I have noticed a choice poem by Longfellow, Tennyson, or lesser bard—even a poem with which I am familiar—than to wade through a mass of namby-pamby stuff whose sole merit is that it is "original." The poems you give us from the magazines are well enough in their way, too; they are a great deal better than anything you get out here. True, they are written by rhymesters as a rule, and not by poets; but then we have not even clever rhymesters here. I fancy your correspondent must be one of the doggerel bards who afflict all of our newspapers, and who are bruised in the flesh by seeing their productions set aside for uninteresting editorials, New York and London letters, and the like—mere, bald prose. I am led to this conclusion by the identity in initials and dates between his letter and some doggerel in last week's "Tuneful Liar"—some of the very worst doggerel I ever saw, out of all the mass of doggerel you have printed. He scores your proof-reader causelessly; perhaps that worthy man accidentally got some sense into his verses at some time. He remarks: "The errors which find their way into your paper are stupid and damnable." To which I may add, so are some of the verses.

SAN FRANCISCO, December 10, 1882.

PASQUINO.

To the Unfortunate: "Magdalena"—declined. "Mince Pies: A Christmas Story"—declined. "Old Sandy McGowan"—declined. "How Misery Taylor got Even"—declined. "The Niobe"—declined. "School Association"—declined. "How Much People are like Bugs"—declined. "A Welcome to Princess Louise"—declined. "Existing Evils—Five Papers. 1. Seeds of Immortality"—declined.

VANITY FAIR.

Light lilac kid gloves, stitched with black, are the correct style for gentlemen in connection with evening dress, and for button-hole flowers the chrysanthemum is now in high favor.

In lace pins, a new and howling device is a row of oxidized silver pug dogs running from large to small. They are given different names, and wearers of the pin do not fear hydrophobia.

Something new in alleged Japanese teapots is in the form of a dragon, very hideous to look at, but unique as an ornament. It is believed that no mother-in-law's table will be without one.

Flowers as table ornaments at dinner-parties are not as much used this season as last, and the florists are very much disgusted. Huge candlesticks of brass are now the popular dinner-table decorations.

A new hangle has a lot of comical monkeys hanging from it by their tails. These hangles come in silver and gilt, and are said to be of French origin. Ladies who wear them are not necessarily the missing links.

Just now a determined effort is being made to introduce a new style of arranging the hair. The instigators of the movement are declared to be hair-dressers and false-hair dealers, whose business of late has been very dull and unprofitable.

Oscar Wilde scarf-pins are the newest, and are already worn by many club-men. They—the scarf-pins—represent a tiny donkey with superfluously big ears, and on its side are stamped the figures "2 2." And now everybody knows why they are called Oscar Wilde scarf-pins.

Oyster-plates of plain white china are now declared to be the most genteel, the decorated ones of majolica having become "quite too awfully common." These "most genteel" plates represent single shells—as if any one ever heard of, much less ever saw, a pure white oyster-shell.

Genuine furs seem few and far between, and every other woman one sees on the street has the imitation. Even dyed rabbit skin is palmed off for coney, and what is called black Russian fur is nothing but goat-skin dyed. This is one of the best years on record for fashionable deceptions.

The latest thing in umbrellas which has had the honor to take the fancy of the Prince of Wales is one in which the greatest simplicity is de rigueur, consisting as it does of an ehony crutch-handle along which a silver lion is sprawling. Cunningly hollowed out in this crutch is a steel-lined receptacle for matches and cigarettes.

A new fashion in Paris is that of spoon-shaped bonnets. They do not stand up straight above the head, as did those of a similar form which were in vogue some fifteen years ago, but the point projects over the wearer's brow. So far they are in dark velvet, with the fronts lined with pale-colored satin. Another new fashion is the custom adopted by young society men of carrying canes to the opera—not delicate switches, but good-sized, solid, substantial sticks.

A Paris actress avers that each perfume has its special moral and physical qualities, which—so far as her observations have gone—she states as follows: Musk predisposes to sensibility and amiability; rose, to audacity, avarice, and pride; geranium, to tenderness; violet, to mysticism and piety; benzoin, to dreams, poetry, and inconstancy; mint and verberna, to a taste for the beautiful arts; camphor, to stupidity and brutality; Russia leather, to indolence, while ylang-ylang is the most dangerous of all.

The old-fashioned reception-day of each week has fallen very much into disuse. Ladies complain, with reason, that their friends are apt to disregard their summons, and to call whenever it suits their own convenience. A frantic desire to go out on that particular occasion is also apt to seize the hostess herself. So that it is found more expeditious and convenient to convene one's friends for one or two days in a certain month, and thus fulfill the duties of hospitality without incurring the horedom of a perpetually recurring reception-day.

Since it is not good form for gentlemen to wear gloves, somebody has been trying to put gloves out of fashion for ladies also. But it will not do. The excuse given is that handsome rings are hidden by gloves. Rings are worn as ornaments certainly, but still ladies do not wish to make a hold display of them. Besides—but this must be said softly—there are feminine hands which—well, which look better in gloves. I sounded a young lady on the glove question. "What," she said, "go without gloves? No, indeed. Never heard of such a thing." And her hands were small and altogether lovely.

An English resident in London writes that that suavity of manner and that desire to be, in shining, thoroughly agreeable, which in the time of Rousseau distinguished the French aristocracy, no longer exist among their descendants. Polite society hardly exists. There are polite individuals, chiefly to be met with at the bar and in the corps enseignant. The poor are, on the whole, better mannered than the rich, and are still capable of disinterested and spontaneous civility. The old French spirit comes out in petty employees when they are treated as gentlemen. If curt speech is employed in addressing them, they at once grow crusty.

J. A. Gotch, a noted London architect, is considered the great authority on male attire. He says that the chimney-pot hat is positively ugly, the swallow-tail inartistic, and the artificial necktie an abomination. The proper covering for the throat should be tied in a knot. The shirt, he thinks, is objectionable, as it is worn only for the cuffs, collar, and front. A seaman's jersey should take its place, with a collar and cuffs on the outside. The trousers are only a sieve for conveying dust to the ankles, and they wear out at the knees. In hunting, cricketing, hoating, and bicycling men wear dresses which are at once convenient and picturesque. Outside of this, Mr. Gotch says that a man's present costume is hideous.

INTAGLIOS.

Transformation.

She kissed me, my beautiful darling;
I drank the delight of her lips;
The universe melted together,
Mortality stood in eclipse.
A Spirit of Light stood before me,
I heard a far rustle of wings;
The kings of the earth were as beggars,
The beggars of earth were as kings.
—Richard Realf.

Sorrow.

When I was young, I said to sorrow,
"Come, and I will play with thee!"
He is near me now all day,
And at night returns to say,
"I will come again to-morrow—
I will come and stay with thee."

Through the world we walk together—
His soft footsteps rustle by me;
To shield an unregarded head
He hath built a winter shed;
And all night in rainy weather
I hear his gentle breathings by me.
—Audrey De Vere.

The Thrush.

All through the sultry hours of June,
From morning blithe to golden noon,
And till the star of evening climbs
The gray-blue East, a world too soon,
There sings a Thrush amid the limes.

God's poet, hid in foliage green,
Sings endless songs, himself unseen;
Right seldom come his silent times.
Linger, ye Summer hours serene!
Sing on, dear Thrush, amid the limes!

May I not dream God sends thee there,
Thou mellow angel of the air,
Even to rebuke my earthlier rhymes
With music's soul, all praise and prayer?
Is that thy lesson in the limes?

Closer to God art thou than I:
His minstrel thou, whose brown wings fly
Through silent ether's summer climes.
Ah, never may thy music die!
Sing on, dear Thrush, amid the limes!

—Mortimer Collins.

Ballade of Antique Dances.

Before the town had lost its wits
And scared the bravery from its beaus,
When money-grubs were merely cits
And verse was clear and crisp as prose,
Ere Chloe and Strephon came to blows,
For votes, degrees, and cigarettes,
The world rejoiced to point its toes
In Gigue, Gavotte, and Minuets.

The solemn fiddlers touch their kits;
The tinkling clavichord o'erflows
With contrapuntal quirks and hits;
And, with all measure and repose,
Through figures grave as royal shows,
With noble airs and pirouettes,
They move, to rhythms Handel knows,
In Gigue, Gavotte, and Minuets.

O Fans and Swords, O Sacques and Mitts,
That was the better part you chose!
You know not how those gamesome chits,
Waltz, Polka, and Schottische, arose;
Nor how Quadrille—a kind of dose
In time and tune—the dance besets;
You aired your fashion till the close
In Gigue, Gavotte, and Minuets.

ENVOY.

Muse of the many-tinkling hose,
Terpsichore, O teach your pets
The state, the charm, the grace that glows
In Gigue, Gavotte, and Minuets.

—W. E. Henley.

Youth and Nature.

Is this the sky, and this the very earth
I had such pleasure in when I was young?
And can this be the identical sea-song
Heard once within the storm-clouds' awful girth,
When a great storm from silence burst to birth,
And winds to whom it seemed I did belong
Made the keen blood in me run swift and strong
With irresistible, tempestuous mirth?
Are these the forests loved of old so well,
Where on May nights enchanted music was?
Are these the fields of soft, delicious grass,
These the old hills with secret things to tell?
O my dead youth, was this inevitable,
That with thy passing, Nature, too, should pass?

—Philip Bourke Marston.

Substance and Shadow.

They do but grope in learning's pedant round
Who on the fantasies of sense bestow
An idol substance, bidding us bow low
Before those shades of being which are found,
Stirring or still, on man's brief trial-ground;
As if such shapes and modes, which come and go,
Had aught of Truth or Life in their poor show
To sway or judge, and skill to sain or wound.
Son of immortal seed, high-destined man!
Know thy dread gift—a creature, yet a cause:
Each mind its own centre, and it draws
Home to itself, and molds in its thought's span
All outward things, the vassals of its will,
Aided by Heaven, by earth unthwarted still.

—Cardinal Newman.

The Pipe-Player.

Cool, and palm-shaded from the torrid heat,
The young brown tenor puts his singing by,
And sets the twin pipe to his lip to try
Some air of burlysh-glooms where lovers meet;
O swart musician, time and fame are fleet,
Brief all delight, and youth's feet fain to fly!
Pipe on in peace! To-morrow must we die.
What matter, if our life to-day be sweet?
Soon, soon, the silver paper-reeds that sigh
Along the Sacred River will repeat
The echo of the dark-stoled bearers' feet,
Who carry you, with wailing, where must lie
Your swathed and withered body, by and by,
In perfumed darkness with the grains of wheat.

—E. W. Gosse.

LITERARY NOTES.

"Facts and Phases of Animal Life" is the title of a volume by Vernon S. Morwood. It is written somewhat after the style of the English writers, Wood and Jackson, and possesses many illustrations, and some amusing anecdotes of animals and birds. Published by D. Appleton & Co., New York; for sale by James T. White & Co., 23 Dupont Street.

Mary Clemmer is a poetess of great smoothness and originality. She has collected her verse in a volume entitled "Poems of Life and Nature." There are many charming bits among the poems, and the exquisite form in which the book appears is eminently in keeping with the lines. Published by J. R. Osgood & Co., Boston, Mass.; for sale by the booksellers.

The "Problem of the Poor" is a record of "quiet life in unquiet places." It is written by Helen Campbell, who is at present engaged on the staff of Our Continent. It successively deals with criminal life in New York, the treatment of the insane, the poor man's food, and other similar topics. Published by Fords, Howard & Hulbert, New York; for sale by Bancroft; price, 40 cents.

The latest number of the "Round Robin Series" is entitled "Rachel's Share of the Road." It is a story written for a purpose, and deals with Eastern railroad strikes, and the destitution caused by hard times. There is woven in with it a thread of romance, which, with many striking situations, renders the novel readable in its way. Published by J. R. Osgood & Co., Boston; for sale by Billings, Harbourn & Co.

Several years ago Mr. T. S. Van Dyke wrote an interesting book on Pacific Coast sport, entitled "The Rifle, Rod, and Gun in California." This author has now written a volume treating of "The Still Hunter." It treats for the most part of California game and localities, the deer of the southern portion of the State receiving special attention. Published by Fords, Howard & Hulbert, New York; for sale by Bancroft; price, 52.

Mr. W. C. Morrow has written a large number of striking short stories. Their plots are mostly sombre, dealing with murders and other forms of crime, but they are dealt with in a masterly style, and have frequently interested the readers of the Argonaut, as well as other journals. He now tries his hand at a novel with the title of "Blood Money," which, while it possesses much merit, is perhaps a little too uneven in parts to receive entire commendation. Published and for sale by F. J. Walker & Co., 19 New Montgomery Street.

Although the Prangs have failed to send, or the post-office failed to carry, the usual batch of X-mas cards to the Argonaut, they are pretty enough to be noticed anyway. Miss Dora Wheeler, of New York, carried off the first prize of two thousand dollars this year, as she did at the last competition. Walter Saterlee was adjudged the popular prize of five hundred dollars, while Miss L. B. Humfrey took two medals, of five hundred and three hundred dollars respectively. Frederick Dielman, Miss Florence Taber, and Alfred Fredericks were given the other prizes. The cards are beautifully mounted, and each has inscribed on the back an appropriate bit of verse by Celia Thaxter or Mrs. E. S. Foreman. In connection with these X-mas cards is a set of New Year's cards, and also, what is a novelty for this firm, a number of original New Year's calling cards. These sets may be obtained from L. Prang & Co., Boston, or at the different bookstores.

In the Critic of December 2d there is an interesting article on "American Publishers and English Authors," which will attract the attention of many who are watching the present literary conflict. The prospectus for 1883 of this journal promises many good things, and it is to be hoped that the enterprise of the best and most original literary paper in this country will be endorsed by the public.—The Christmas number of Wide Awake includes such names as Mrs. A. D. T. Whitney, Miss E. S. Phelps, Rose Terry Cook, Rose Kingsley (Reverend Chas. Kingsley's daughter), G. C. Eggleston, Celia Thaxter, Edward E. Hale, Nora Perry, Mrs. Abby Morton Diaz, Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe, Christina Rossetti, A. Mary F. Robinson, Mrs. Mulock-Craig, Philip Bourke Marston, Susan Coolidge, Mrs. Helen Hunt Jackson, Margaret Eyttinge, Marion Harland, Margaret Preston, and other well-known writers. The illustrations are fully up to the letter-press. Published by D. Lothrop & Co., Boston; price, 25 cents.

"Art in the House," by Doctor J. Van Falke, Vice-Director of the Austrian Museum of Art and Industry, in Vienna, translated and edited by Charles C. Perkins, M. A., opens with an account of the Greco-Roman house, as being the most perfect type of the antique dwelling in plan, construction, and decorations. He treats of climatic influence and physical geography in building forms. The Egyptians, notwithstanding their professions of indifference as to their earthly dwellings, lavished immense sums upon their palaces and great houses. The furniture and high colors are fully represented in the volume. We also have glimpses of the Assyrian palaces. The author strives to show how important a part house and home play in our lives, and how much their beauty can add to the pleasure of existence. The work includes descriptions of the Greco-Roman and the mediæval dwellings, the houses of the sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth centuries, style and harmony, mural painting, movable wall-ornaments, furniture and table decorations, and, lastly, discusses in an able and interesting manner woman's æsthetic mission. The volume contains sixty plates, and one hundred and sixty-six figures of furniture, china, glass, silver, etc., illustrated by chromolithographs, albertotypes, and topographic etchings. Published by Prang & Co., Boston; for sale by Payot, Upham & Co.

Announcements: We have reviewed the December Literary Bulletin published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co., of Boston. It contains the announcement of many new and beautiful folio books, such as the new edition of Aldrich's poems, Darley's illustrated edition of "Evangeline," "Scarlet Letter," James T. Field's works, and many others.

The announcement that Doctor Holmes has renounced his professorship in Harvard University comes simultaneously with the announcement that he will, during 1883, write frequently and exclusively for the Atlantic.—The mere announcement of the édition de luxe of Hawthorne has created such a demand that the edition is already nearly exhausted.—J. W. Bouton is about to bring out a notable illustrated work on Bible myths. Its object is to point out all the myths discoverable in the Old and New Testaments, to show that they were held in common with other nations, and to trace their origin and meaning.—The illustrated edition of Aldrich's poems is likely to be very popular in London. Nearly all of Mr. Aldrich's writings have been translated into at least three languages—French, Spanish, and German—and the most popular of his prose works have appeared in Danish, Norwegian, Dutch, Italian, and Russian.—Hector Malot, the author of that beautiful little story, "Sans Famille," which was crowned by the Academy, has just published another, which is described as equally touching and pure in tone. It is entitled "La Petite Sour." It is strange that more of Malot's works have not been translated into English. The pathetic "Romain Kalbris" is one of the few glimpses of this author's brilliant work that we have in our language.—The January number of the Century will contain an article on the late Dean Stanley, by Professor W. H. Myers; and "Who are the Creoles?" by George W. Cable, illustrated by Pennell.—Mr. Austin Dobson has written a preface to an English fac-simile reprint of the first edition of "Robinson Crusoe." This has somewhat delayed his work on his "Life of Longfellow" for the "English Men-of-Letters Series." Since Mr. Longfellow's death the popular demand for his writings has been so great that the Riverside Press has been kept busily at work. The new edition, in two large volumes, bound in leather and brilliantly illustrated, is nearly ready.—Richard Wagner who is preparing to challenge the critics with a great work on "The Arts and Civilization," is writing in a magnificent old palace in Venice, where all his surroundings conduce to a luxurious tranquillity.

GEBHARD AND THE LILY.

The Scandal which Set the New York Gossips' Tongues to Wagging.

Mrs. Langtry again. If she was the talk of the town when she first arrived, how shall I describe her importance now? New York is actually agog with the momentous news of her alleged lapse from the paths of rectitude and virtue which characterized her first few weeks in America. The most insatiable eagerness is displayed by people who should know better to ascertain, if possible, the exact extent of her wrong-doing, and it would seem as though it were the sole and most important aim of every man, woman, and child in New York to find out just how immoral she is. As I write, scores of reporters are scouring the city, interviewing theatrical people who know nothing about Mrs. Langtry, tracing all sorts of wild rumors, and eagerly taking down the words of the gossiping old hens of the clubs. This morning nearly every paper in New York had more or less vulgar articles setting forth the alleged fact that the famous English woman and Bob Hutchins, once Surrogate, were in love, and had gone off together to Boston. At the same time it was stated in an astute Republican paper that there was a rumor in London that Mr. Langtry was seeking a divorce from his wife. Such a statement is, of course, absurd, as they separated amicably some months ago. Special correspondents in Boston discovered the fact that Bob Hutchins had arrived in their city the same day that Mrs. Langtry came, and they immediately interviewed him. He said nothing about Mrs. Langtry, and gave what would appear to be satisfactory reasons for his presence in the city of culture; but the correspondents telegraphed suggestive stories, which were printed conspicuously in the New York papers. Men who are at all familiar with New Yorkers refuse to believe the story, because there is nothing about Bob Hutchins that would attract any woman, and his wealth, though large, is far from being remarkable in this city of millionaires. Besides, he is not only quite coarse and vulgar in manner and speech, but positively unattractive in person. To put the fact bluntly, he is not cleanly, and is addicted to wearing his linen too long without subjecting it to the purifying influence of the washerwoman. That such a man could attract a refined and high-bred woman seemed impossible, and few who knew the man believed the truth of the reports in the morning papers. What gave rise to it all was Mrs. Labouchère's quarrel with the Lily. The two women undoubtedly had a hot interview before the parting. Mrs. Labouchère's story of the quarrel is only one side, however. She says that she came to America with Mrs. Langtry at the solicitation of Mr. Labouchère, to travel with the lady as her friend and adviser.

"I am as much interested in her dramatic success as my husband," says Mrs. Labouchère, "and have done all in my power to further it. I had no wish to quarrel with Mrs. Langtry, but I had occasion to remonstrate with her in regard to a certain acquaintance formed by her in this city, which seemed likely to interfere with her success on the stage, and certain to interfere with my own comfort as her friend and companion. She did not take these remonstrances in good part, but insisted on keeping up this acquaintance in Boston. I then told her that it was impossible for me to accompany her under these circumstances, and she preferred to go to Boston alone."

When this came out, Mrs. Langtry was very strongly condemned. People forgot that it was only one side of a woman's quarrel. Mrs. Labouchère is not well known, or her story would be received with more suspicion. The lady, I happen to know, is very much soured by her reception in America. She is not the legal wife of Labouchère, and that one little fact, though possibly of small consequence to the members of the "Prince's set" in London, is a vast obstacle in the way of social recognition here. Many people would have invited Mrs. Langtry to their houses had it not been for the presence of her friend. Mrs. Labouchère made a great mistake when she allowed her ill-nature to show itself in silly criticisms of things American. She said, for instance, that our women had the manners of servants, dressed like waitresses out on a holiday, and were remarkable for their extreme plainness of visage. A more ridiculously false statement could not be made, and it naturally recoiled on the woman who made it. So Mrs. Labouchère became more and more unpopular, but Mrs. Langtry clung to her with undaunted pluck. The invitations to dinners given by wealthy bachelors to the Jersey Lily always included Mrs. Labouchère, but she became more and more unpopular. It must be remembered that Mrs. Langtry has been bred a lady, while Mrs. Labouchère's breeding was got when she was a rather sensational London actress, known as Kate Hodson. However, it is a settled thing that the two women have parted, and everybody, including the reporters, is trying to find out who the "certain acquaintance" is toward whom Mrs. Labouchère cherishes so much resentment.

It is now Tuesday. None of the papers have yet given his name, though the probabilities are that it will come out long before this letter gets to San Francisco. The name of the youth you have seen before. I once wrote a whole letter about him. He is an ass, and an imitation of everything that is English, and his name is Freddie Gebhard. I state this without any hesitation whatever, because I have heard Mr. Gebhard brag of his alleged conquest, and know of his extravagant entertainments in the Lily's honor. The youth has several millions, and lives like a prince. He is a member of the Knickerbocker, Union, and Coaching clubs, and runs after women constantly. He affects the most grotesque of English draws, and imports everything he wears and uses direct from London. He is thin and unhealthy looking, and drives miserably. Nevertheless, he has a social position of some importance, and has some imitators. He wears the colors of the Prince of Wales, and sneers ineffably at things American. It would, of course, occur to such a being that the woman whom the Prince of Wales had known was the woman he should know. It surprised no one, therefore, to hear that "Freddie had sent nine hundred and sixty dollars' worth of flowers" to Mrs. Langtry during her engagement at Wallack's. He did not conceal his good fortune in having been received by Mrs. Langtry, and talked with great candor of Mrs. Labouchère, whom he disliked, because she would have nothing to do with him. He has been very happy at various times—notably when he took the famous beauty up the road behind his new team of trotters, and was envied by every man who drove a horse. Every night he was to be found at the theatre smiling, with an air of great condescension to his friends.

A short time ago Lord Douglass Gordon arrived in New York from a Western trip, and at once called on the Jersey Lily. He came away looking gloomy and morose. An hour later the clubs were chattering over the fact, and investing it with a vast importance. Me Lawd had followed the Lily over here, the clubs said, and been unmercifully snubbed in return. Every one then opened his eyes and said there would be a big rumour when Me Lawd met Freddie Gebhard. In the course of time they met—would it be possible for an English lord to be in America and Freddie Gebhard not meet him? But the scandal-mongers who expected a quarrel at the meeting of the two men were woefully disappointed; for they talked in the most commonplace manner, and went to dinner together. A few nights later, and every one was chattering about a late supper at Delmonico's, consisting of four people—Mrs. Langtry, Mr. Gebhard, Me Lawd, and an unknown lady. Then it was discovered that Lord Douglass Gordon had never been an admirer of Mrs. Langtry in London, and called on her here just for the fun of the thing. A few nights later, a large dinner-party was given to the Lily by a jolly bon vivant of advanced age, but great wealth, to which was invited, among other guests, Lord Mandeville. When Mrs. Langtry heard that this noble scion of British nobility was to be present, she positively refused to go to the dinner. Some questioning revealed the fact that the Jersey Lily considered herself insulted because Lady Mandeville had not called on her, though her ladyship had been in New York three weeks. Upon learning of this, Lady Mandeville sneered indignantly, and said she would not recognize the actress. Lord Mandeville, as soon as he ascertained the exact hitch, hurriedly withdrew his acceptance to the invitation to dinner, and things were smoothed out. Lady Mandeville has sneered at the idea of recognizing Mrs. Langtry here, though it is said that she sought an introduction to her when she was the reigning queen of London society.

No further gossip was heard about Mrs. Langtry until yesterday, when she left for Boston. Suddenly the whole of New York became violently excited, and the wildest efforts were made to find out who had won his way into the Lily's good graces. Jack Cutting was the first man accused, and after him came George Gould, the son of Jay Gould, and then vague rumors about Gebhard, who was said to be still suffering from the mortification of his rejection by Miss Jerome. I wrote you some time ago that he had been jilted, but did not suspect at the time that he felt so very much broken up. There is no doubt now, however, that he was deeply disappointed by it, for it was a more brilliant match than he deserved. It is quite possible that he hoped to revenge himself on the beautiful girl who threw him over by his liaison with the famous professional beauty from across the water, for he has certainly taken some trouble to have his intimacy with Mrs. Langtry noised abroad. Mr. Freddie Gebhard certainly went to Boston, but he just as certainly did not go with Mrs. Langtry, and is not with her now.

Abbey, the manager, is extremely provoked at the scandal, and he has reason to be, for it will certainly affect his star's business in her tour through the country. Her reputation for being a little fast was strong enough through the rumors of her kindnesses to the Prince of Wales, and she had nothing to gain, but much to lose, by a new scandal on this side of the water. There was a feeling among the people here that she was in earnest as an actress, and deserved a good opportunity to show what she could do. It was the same sentiment that existed when Bernhardt was here—"never mind what she is as a woman, we have only to judge her on the stage." Mrs. Langtry herself expressed a deep desire to be judged on her merits, and so she was judged. The newspapers treated her with consideration, until the rumors of her lapse were set afloat, when they sprang on her track like hounds. Nothing new could be unearthed about the Lily, but the careers of her lovers were explored, and the most astonishing things were brought to light. One enterprising journal made all of its esteemed contemporaries blush with envy by publishing a lot of Mr. Gebhard's letters to various people. They were remarkable specimens of illiterate writing. One to the Jersey Lily was addressed to "my dear friend," and accompanied a basket of "fruit." He seems to have a decided antipathy to the use of the letter i. A letter to a celebrated firm of wine importers, reads:

Mes Purdy & Nichols.

Gentlemen: Please to send me two number 100 fifth Avenue seven cases of Pomry seek. In haste.

FRED GEBHARD.

It has also come about since the Lily's departure that young George Gould bought a four-thousand-dollar diamond ring at Tiffany's for her, but that she refused to accept it. It is a difficult matter to decide just how much truth exists in the many stories about the beauty, but it is quite plain that she has slipped up somewhere in her social relations in New York.

FLANEUR.

NEW YORK, December 5.

After the Parisians abandoned the "pig," which was for some time a favorite mantle ornament and a much worn article of bijouterie, and was thought to carry luck to its owner, they substituted with the same view a repulsive-looking miniature hunchback. For some time that was the rage, and dainty ladies did not hesitate to wear the ungainly little object, suspended from their chateaines and bracelet-chains, but that, too, has been discarded now for a new porte-bonheur that comes straight from Vienna; it is a mushroom. When made in silver the mushroom is so designed as to be really very pretty, and, more than all, it is said to be marvelously lucky. Paris gallants are also sending their innamoratas long hisque baskets, in imitation of plaited straw, the partly raised lid reveals the forms of a little boy and girl at one end; the remainder of the basket is filled with a loose cluster of roses and violets. The little girl has her pretty head bent, as if in the act of smelling one of the roses.

A certain gilded youth is making himself conspicuous in New York by wearing a standing-room-only suit of bright green cloth, through which runs a gold thread that gayly glistens in the sunlight.

THE PHANTOM OF THE "PALATINE."

The Story of a Wreck.

C. B. Todd, in an interesting paper in the December Litt-pincott on Block Island, or, as it is sometimes called, the Island of the Manisees, recounts the stories of the various wrecks which have occurred off the coast of Rhode Island, and at the mouth of Long Island Sound. A volume, novel and interesting, the writer observes, might be filled with records of these wrecks. The old men love to recount them, snugly seated by their fires of peat, while the blast shrieks fiercely without. There is one, however, that they rarely touch upon—the most famous of all—so famous that it has been celebrated in song and story, and is known the wide world over—the wreck of the ship Palatine, whose ghostly figure, wreathed in flame, is still seen gliding down the Sound of nights, awaking the awe of the superstitious and the futile researches of the learned. Whittier, in his fine poem, "The Palatine," has given wide currency to the legend. His version is that current on the mainland, but it is false in every particular, and does gross injustice to the islanders. In this poem, it will be remembered, the vessel is spoken of as being lured ashore by "false lights over the rocky Head," and the wreckers are pictured as swooping down like birds of prey, tearing out the heart of the wreck, and afterward burning it, that no traces of their crime might remain. The true story of the Palatine, however, is almost the opposite of this, and runs as follows: About the year 1720, nearly two hundred emigrants from the German Palatinate embarked at the Hague in a vessel bound to New York. Many of them were well-to-do burghers, and bore with them a store of guilders for the purchase of land or for purposes of trade. This treasure the officers of the ship coveted, and agreed on a plan to secure it; accordingly, they treated the poor passengers with the utmost rigor, penned them up in narrow, filthy compartments, starved them with insufficient food, and kept the vessel so long at sea that nearly all the emigrants were sick or dead ere she sighted the American coast. Passing inside Montauk, she came ashore on Block Island, probably by design, and the surviving emigrants were hurriedly put ashore, leaving their effects on board—all except one woman, who persisted in remaining by her treasure. At flood-tide the vessel floated clear, and, with the woman and crew on board, drifted down the Sound. She was never seen in her material form again; but it was currently reported that the crew burned her to hide their crime, escaping to the shore in boats, and that the woman perished with the vessel. But now comes the strangest part of the tale. A year after the disappearance of the Palatine (for so the ship came to be called, from the poor Palatines her passengers, although no one knew her real name, or the name of her officers, or had seen her papers), a strange light began to be seen hovering about the coast. At first it appeared like a ship's jib, dancing over the water, sometimes near the surface, and again elevated as high as a mast-head above it; in a short time two of these sails of flame appeared; and, before the first year had passed, the entire ship—hull, decks, masts, shrouds, and sails—had been seen, sharply defined in fire, and madly careering over the billows. The hardy fishermen soon discovered that her appearance heralded storm and disaster, nor were they slow in connecting her with the Palatine which had drifted away from their shores the year before, and which they believed was now being purified by purgatorial fires, her cruel officers doomed to man her fiery decks and haunt the scene of their crimes until this should be accomplished. The apparition caused a great excitement among the simple fishermen, and throngs of the curious came to see and judge for themselves of this strange appearance. For a hundred years the light continued to linger about the island, and then suddenly disappeared, and it was believed that the unquiet spirits were finally at rest. But within the last two years it has suddenly reappeared, and the local public is again agog with speculations concerning it. It is certain that such a phenomenon does appear off the western coast of the island, between it and the mainland, and the fact is worthy the investigation of the scientist. Doctor Aaron C. Willey, a reputable citizen, formerly residing on the island, in a letter published in 1811, averred that he had several times seen it, and had studied it critically. The first time was at early twilight in February, 1810; the second on the 20th of December of the same year, when he mistook it for the light of a passing vessel, but soon discovered his mistake. "It moved along apparently parallel with the shore for about two miles," he says, in the letter referred to; "then it remained in one place for some time, when it moved off quickly for several rods, and again made a halt. Alternately in a state of motion and then of rest, it finally disappeared altogether." We have no authentic account of the Palatine light appearing to any once since 1832, until the summer of 1880, when the phantom was suddenly presented to Mr. Joseph P. Hazard, an estimable citizen of Narragansett Pier, Rhode Island. In a letter to the local newspaper, that gentleman thus narrates his experience: "When I first saw the light it was two miles off the coast. I suspected nothing but ordinary sails, however, until I noticed that the light upon reappearing was apparently stationary for a few moments, when it suddenly started toward the coast, and, immediately expanding, became much less bright, assuming somewhat the form of a long, narrow jib, sometimes two of them, as if each were on a different mast. I saw neither spar nor hull, but noticed that the speed was very great—certainly not less than fifteen knots—and they surged and pitched, as though madly rushing upon raging billows." As to the causes that produced this singular phenomenon, the writer ventures no opinion, content with introducing it to the notice of investigators. But while on the island he made a point of gathering all the data to be had concerning it, and the proof as to its existence and characteristics was conclusive. There was also an entire unanimity of opinion as to its nature and origin—all declared it to be the spectre of a burning ship. Gnarled and grizzled veterans, strong of nerve and keen of eye, had seen it rise suddenly before them while out on lonely fishing cruises, every mast, spar, rope, and sail perfectly outlined in fire. There were strong young men, too, rather skeptical than otherwise of the existence of the supernatural, to whom it had appeared under like circumstances, and who believed firmly in the recorded

PUBLISHERS' NOTICE.

The Argonaut is published every Saturday, at No. 522 California Street, by the Argonaut Publishing Company.
 Subscription, $4.00 per year; six months, $2.25; three months, $1.50, payable in advance—postage prepaid. City subscribers served by carriers at $4.50 per year, or 10 cents per week. Sample copies free. Single copies, 10 cents.
 News Dealers and Agents in the interior supplied by the San Francisco News Company, Post Street, above Dupont, to whom all orders from the trade should be addressed.
 The American News Company, New York, and branches, are Agents for the Eastern trade. The Argonaut can be ordered from any News Dealer in the United States or Europe.
 Persons mailing single copies of the Argonaut must affix a two-cent stamp.
 No traveling canvassers employed. Order by mail, or through your local News Dealer.
 Subscribers wishing their addresses changed should give their old as well as new addresses.
 Address all communications to "The Argonaut, 522 California Street, San Francisco."
 A. P. STANTON, Business Manager.

ENTERED AT THE SAN FRANCISCO POSTOFFICE AS SECOND CLASS MATTER.

THE ARGONAUT.

FRANK M. PIXLEY - - - - - Editor.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 16, 1882.

CONTENTS:

Page	Page
EDITORIALS:	OLLA-PODRIDA:
The new Southern Pacific road and the Possibilities it Opens up—The Question of Freight Again—San Francisco as a Commercial and Railroad Centre—The Bulletin Reanimates the Water Skeleton—Congress and the Revenue Question—Estee and the Leather Medal—Mrs. Langtry, with a Moral—Harry George—9	Plagiarism and Plagiarists—Are we All, Unconsciously, Literary Thieves?—What Sir Walter Scott Thought on the Subject—Why was the Rev. Starr King a Preacher?—Some of his Ideas and Similarities—A Suggested Improvement for the Daily Papers..... 5
PLUCKED FROM THE BURNING..... 1-2	VANITY FAIR..... 6
THE ALLERGED HUMORISTS..... 2	INTERGLIOS..... 6
INDIVIDUALITIES..... 2	LITERARY NOTES..... 6
LABORERS IN HAWAII..... 3	GEHARD AND THE LILY..... 7
AN OLD FAVORITE..... 3	THE PHANTOM OF THE "PALA-TINE"..... 7
THE CITY OF CANALS..... 3	STORVETTES..... 10
SOCIETY NOTES AND GOSSIP..... 4	BETSY B.'S LETTER..... 12
	THE TUNEFUL LIAR..... 14

The consummation of a second transcontinental railroad, connecting the Bay of San Francisco with the Gulf of Mexico, is to us an event of importance. The completion of our first road was an era in the history of our State. We had discounted its benefits, had our boom in real estate, and so enjoyed ourselves in anticipation of the event, that when it happened we were disappointed somewhat that its completion did not usher in an immediate millennium. San Francisco, up to that time, having been the receiving and distributing point of all passengers and merchandise, naturally experienced a set-back when this business was done along the entire line of the railroad, and when it was not necessary or the passengers from the Sacramento and San Joaquin valleys to come to San Francisco to take ship or enter the harbor of San Francisco before reaching their homes elsewhere in the State. We shall experience a similar loss of trade and passenger traffic when the Villard system shall be completed and accommodate the people of Oregon and Washington Territory with direct Eastern communication. Again, we shall find a rival competing for our business when the Atchison, Topeka, and Santa Fé road shall have finished lines to San Diego and Guaymas. Our compensation for these losses is in the increasing population, growing trade, and extending commerce that come as natural results from thus multiplying the great highways of trade. Now, our much maligned California railroad-builders have completed a second transcontinental road connecting the two oceans. The significance of this road to us lies in the fact that it is owned and managed by Californians; that it has received neither subsidies of money nor bounties of land from the General Government; and that it is in a moral sense independent of Government control, and has a right to be let alone in its management. The ever-meddlesome press has, so far as the Southern road is concerned, no right to dictate to it or interfere with it; and even the party demagogue may remember that neither individuals nor municipal, nor county, nor State, nor General Government has paid anything or contributed a dollar for its building. Neither the Chronicle, Samuel Seabough, Mr. Estee, John Doyle, Esq., the Honorable Tom Fitch of Arizona, Mr. Harrison of —, nor the Wasp, has ever been taxed a dollar for it. Neither the Examiner nor the Democratic party has been laid under contribution for this road in the hands of Messrs. Stanford, Huntington, Crocker & Co.

The gentlemen composing this management, with Mr. Towne the superintendent, Mr. Frederick Crocker, and Mr. —, are now at the front to celebrate the second union of roads. This will be accomplished in a few days, and we may take an unbroken ride from San Francisco, by way of Galveston in Texas, to New Orleans, over roads owned and controlled by Californians. The importance of this fact—viz., that this great road is owned and controlled by Californians, whose association and interest naturally induce them to favor the western terminus—will be recognized. Our commercial jurisdiction extends to a limit coterminous with transportation. To illustrate: two roads being built, one from Chicago and run in the interest of that city, and one from San Francisco eastward, owned in San Francisco and run in the interest of that city, it will be found that the commercial supremacy will be felt from Chicago west and from San Francisco east, just to the extent of their respective roads. This awful thing which our small politicians and small editors style "discrimination" comes into play. Each road discriminates in favor of its own city. The road, in its desire for long freights, will carry the products and merchandise from San Francisco east just as far as it possibly can, and at decreasing rates. It will bring merchandise from the east to its San Francisco terminus, if possible, in order to earn upon a long travel, and it will charge larger comparative freights upon short than long distances. This is illustrated by the Central and Union Pacific roads. The San Francisco merchant distributes his goods just as far eastward as the Central Pacific road reaches. Any one traveling overland by these routes will observe the empty oyster cans, sardine boxes, the abandoned packages which have contained small merchandise, the bottles that have held beer or wine, the papers thrown aside from goods consumed, and will find them all, this side of Ogden, marked San Francisco, and all beyond marked with the name of some Eastern city. If Jay Gould or Vanderbilt owned a continuous road from New York City to San Francisco, the Sacramento and Stockton merchants would buy their goods east of the Rocky Mountains. If Stanford & Co. owned a continuous line from San Francisco to New York, the San Francisco manufacturer and trader would distribute their goods beyond the Mississippi. This is a natural law of trade. The interest of the transportation company, whether by rail or steamer, is with its home terminus—is to carry its local productions as far from home as possible, and to bring the productions of other localities from as long a distance as its steam route or railroad line reaches. Another hundred miles of extension to the Central Pacific road would have given us the trade of the Great Salt Lake City and of the territory of Utah. Five hundred miles further eastward, and we would have supplied Denver, and Cheyenne, and Colorado, and Wyoming. If Stanford & Co. owned the road to the Missouri River at Omaha, with the branch to Kansas City, and the entire system that accommodates the west Missouri country, they would discriminate in favor of their long line. The Eastern branches, which now gather up the trade of the locality and send it East, would have been used as tentacles to grasp this same trade, and, bringing it to the trunk line, would have sent it west to San Francisco. The city of New York has not so vast an advantage over us as a commercial port, as many think. The difference in the cost of transporting merchandise from ports in Europe, as between New York and San Francisco, is not enough to account for the difference in trade. The relation of the cost of transportation and value to the vast majority of articles consumed is not of sufficient importance to determine whether they shall come from New York west or go from San Francisco east. The port of New York has a shorter European line than has San Francisco. San Francisco has a shorter Asiatic line than has New York. New York has advantage in trade with the West Indies and the eastern coast of South America. San Francisco has the advantage in the Pacific islands, and the Australian trade, and the West Coast, Mexican, Central, and South American trade. One of the most serious difficulties which this coast has to contend with is the fact that the East is the home of capital. It is the centre of enterprise. The men of money and brains who project and execute great business schemes live and have their interests in the East, and not in the West. To Jay Gould or Vanderbilt San Francisco is an outlying province, to be despoiled. They would look upon California as a Roman proconsul looked upon farther Gaul. To them the Californian is a trans-Alpine barbarian, to be despoiled, to pay tribute, to be brought in manacles to Rome to enhance their triumphs. It would serve some of the grumbling idiots of our commercial and producing classes right to have the Californian people turn over the California system of railroads to an Eastern syndicate; to put the whole business under the control and management of non-residents, who do not read the Examiner, and who are not called upon to vote for Mr. Estee; who never heard of John Doyle, and who would pay no more attention to the small outcry of demagogues and newspaper scribbles than our seals at the ocean shore do to the gulls which cry at the Farallones. These men would snap their fat thumbs at all their complaints, and pay no heed to them. If we had wrongs, they would let us seek our remedies in the courts. In answer to even just complaints they would give us the law's delay. Instead, as now, of the prompt rectification of mistakes and the prompt adjustment of all just causes of dissatisfaction, our business men would experience the indifference that would naturally arise from distance, and from want of local and personal sympathy, and self-interest with the class or locality affected.

The new road, belonging exclusively to one corporation, subject to one management, owned by our own people, and terminating in San Francisco, is relieved from many embarrassments incident to the northern route, which must do its business, convey its passengers, and transport its freight over the lines of not less than six different railroad companies, with their varying and ever-changing tariffs. Emigration contracts may be made in Europe for conveyance to California direct, without subjecting the emigrant to the rivalries and rogues which beset him from the time he lands at Castle Garden until he reaches a cyclone on the northwestern prairies. This road should give us the trade of Arizona, southern Utah, New Mexico, parts of Texas, parts of Sonora and Chihuahua across the Mexican border line, and will, if our merchants and manufacturers exhibit commercial enterprise. San Francisco should be the receiving and distributing point for two thousand miles eastward. The climate of the country through which the road is built, the light grades and long tangents, together with the superior structure, and steel rails, and the superior equipments, guarantee to this road speedy and uninterrupted transportation at all times of the year. Cheap fares and cheap freights will come as a matter of course from the competition which will necessarily be engendered by rival enterprises. It is urged that railroad companies do not compete, but combine, and yet it is true that they do compete till the lowest possible living rate is reached; then they combine in mutual self-defense. In all the Eastern States and in all of Europe we have witnessed similar operations, attended with the same results. The first road is exacting; the second brings adjustment; the third fierce rivalry; and, when finally fares and freights have been brought down to non-remunerative rates, they come back again under compromises and combinations to fair figures, where they remain. We are already assured of five railroads connecting the Pacific and Atlantic waters. The road from the British possessions through the Canadian Dominion; the railroad system whose Pacific terminus is Puget Sound and the mouth of the Columbia; the Central and Union Pacific with its terminus at the Bay of San Francisco; the Atlantic and Pacific road from St. Louis west, connecting with the Central Pacific system some hundreds of miles west of the Mojave station; the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé terminating at San Diego and Guaymas, and the Southern Pacific at San Francisco. Uniting all these roads will be one from Washington Territory along the Pacific Coast to San Diego, and ultimately extending along the Mexican and Central American border. Equalizing the transcontinental business is the ocean navigation from Alaska to Panama along the coast, which enables the San Francisco merchant to receive freight or ship it by any of the railroad routes or by the way of Panama. The India, China, or Hawaiian merchant, doing business with New York, may choose either transcontinental railroad. Thus, in time, and in brief time, the laws of trade, the natural rivalry and the competition of transportation companies, will adjust all the difficulties under which we are now working. When this is brought about, the railroads will disappear from our politics, as they have in a great measure from the Eastern States, and almost entirely from Europe. The idea that all the railroads can combine is chimerical and fantastic. The idea that one syndicate can control and operate them all is absurd and imaginative. There are rules and laws as certain and as fixed in the business as in the natural world. Railroad men and railroad corporations are compelled to recognize them. The laws of gravitation, centripetal and centrifugal forces, are not more unchangeable than the laws governing the transportation of persons and merchandise. The Southern Pacific road is an immense fact in the history of this State, and time will demonstrate the debt the people owe to its builders. It was an ambitious work. Its conception could only have originated in the brain of a broad man. Its realization could only have been accomplished by the resolution and enterprise of active and energetic men. If the writer did not fear the malice of the small-brained, the malignant, and the jealous, he would suggest that it would be better if we did not conspire to drive these railroad-builders out of the State just at present, as it is barely within the possibilities that they may build more railroads. Perhaps, if they do not build more, and content themselves with their present earning of annual millions, it would not do the State any great harm if we should permit them to dwell among us and spend their incomes here. They might, perhaps, construct more elegant dwellings, have other country-seats, erect in our city other commercial blocks, breed faster horses, plant other vineyards, and give us more cable roads. They might, if they were not harassed with small vexations from press, and politicians, and the crawling ambition of small demagogues, consent to die in the country, and, in their advancing years, in grateful recollection of the place where their fortunes were made, might contribute to its public institutions. They might, at least, have built for them monuments of bronze or marble to mark their resting places. They might while living not be unmindful of charities, and, in death, not forget to immortalize themselves by popular bequests.

We were delightfully anticipant of some most rich and toothsome gossip. We looked forward to racy and piquant slanders. We were in hopes of a feast of flagrant things from the Labouchère and the Langtry, when they should finally open their batteries upon each other. We caught the first sibilant whispers of the coming cyclone of defamation, and awaited with anxious expectation the uprending of ever so many reputations when these female adventurers should get their work in. The Labouchère has shamefully disappointed the country. She fired her Parthian arrow and fled. The Langtry answers with silence and a sneer. We sincerely hope the Associated Press will not tamely submit to this condition of things, and allow its Western readers to lose all the splendid details of these women's lives, as told by each other. There are tidbits of infamous personalities, there are suggestions of dreadful things, and obscure hints which only whet our appetites for the delightful and slanderous calumnies that lie within the inner lives of these ladies of the demi-upper-monde. We are ever so sorry that Mrs. Langtry was disappointed in not penetrating the better society of Boston, and that the mansions of Beacon Hill did not open their doors to these fragrant females from London. The woman who calls herself Labouchère has withdrawn from the Langtry the moral protection which her matronizing influence threw around her, and the Langtry is left to the seductive wiles of the man with a stare, and an eye-glass, and a four-in-hand drag. It would be very strange, indeed, if any respectable American home should be thrown open to these notorious adventuresses, or if any modest American woman should seek their society for its companionship; nor do we believe that there is any respectable circle in England where virtuous women welcome these and such as these. We have heard for two or three years past of the celebrity of certain professional beauties, of their being presented at court, of their attending garden-parties given by her majesty the queen—that lady whose majesty is not so much that she is Queen of England, as that she has adorned the domestic circle, and is the queen of the good and modest women of our English race. It is possible that this royal lady may have been imposed upon by adventuresses. We know that many a young English girl has knelt before her queen in court presentation whose ripening years have produced a harvest of crime. But there is no social place among the good women of England or America for questionable show-women, or women who can not truthfully call themselves wives. We recall the controversy over Mrs. Lewes. How earnest was the effort to allow her genius to cover as with a mantle her illegal marital relations. It did not succeed, and the genius of George Eliot is a thing apart from herself. Her writings may adorn the shelves of our libraries and live as the companion of our intellectual lives; but when we talk of her in the presence of wives, and sisters, and daughters, she is George Eliot, and not Mrs. Lewes.

If anything were wanting to convince intelligent people that the Bulletin is insincere upon the water question, and that its object is to secure neither accommodation to the people nor economy to the city, it is afforded in its editorial of Tuesday. To so misstate figures as to make them appear true; to so suppress truth as to make it appear error; to misrepresent, garble, and cover up plain propositions in order to deceive, may be a good and safe way to work personal revenge against the owners of Spring Valley water stock, and depreciate the company's property; but it does not convince anybody that it is sincerely, honestly, and honorably endeavoring to correct a popular abuse or remedy a public evil. When the Bulletin figures the entire area of the Golden Gate Park into square yards, and declares that the price of one cent per month per square yard is to be charged by the Spring Valley Water Company for irrigation, and makes it appear that the practical result of this action by the Supervisors and corporation managers is to cost the municipal government seven hundred thousand dollars per annum, it is a deliberate attempt at practical misrepresentation, unworthy of respectable journalism. The Golden Gate Park contains over one thousand acres of land, of which less than one-fourteenth part is irrigated. If the company should charge the full rate and to the irrigated area add all the other parks in the city, the sum would be a little over four thousand dollars a month, instead of forty-nine thousand dollars, as represented by the Bulletin's figures. And, so far as we know anything about the Golden Gate Park, it pays nothing for water used on lawns, shrubbery, conservatory, nursery, and avenues. It is equally absurd that the company should only be paid for water actually used through its bydrants for extinguishing fires. It is a fact, and this fact is alone conclusive of the company's equity: it is necessitated to have reservoirs so placed, and pipes for distribution of a larger capacity, because of the fire necessity. San Francisco owes its safety and its existence to the protection afforded to property by Spring Valley water. Insurance rates are at a minimum in this city. Without this water, property would be uninsurable, and to talk of depending upon a few widely distributed old tanks left us from the time of the volunteer department, as a protection from fire, is either the drivell of a fool or the misinformation of an evil-disposed person. To fix metres at every fire-plug, and to measure the water used at the parks and other public places, is to necessitate their being placed at the house of every consumer—a vexatious and unnecessary proceeding, and one which would be to the last degree improper. The truth is, somebody must pay the Spring Valley Water Company enough money to enable them to keep up their works and run the machine. If the city and property shirk their duty, the burden will fall upon consumers. We write this because we believe that all this water controversy can be arranged to the satisfaction of stockholders, consumers, and property-holders, if it can ever get out of politics and come under the adjustment of fair-minded and honest men. We think the company is desirous of reaching this result. We think the Bulletin has determined that the controversy shall never be dropped. We think the Bulletin in this matter is governed by motives of a personal character, and that it is dishonest and insincere in everything it writes about the Spring Valley Water Company. And we think the people know it.

It occurs to us that the butter-makers are unwisely giving away the secrets of their own business, and somewhat unnecessarily advertising the new product called oleomargarine. If the new product made from the fat of kine can not be distinguished from that made from the fat of the milk of kine; if the slaughtered bull contains a bonanza of butter heretofore undiscovered; if in quality, color, flavor, and chemical components it is the same; if science and the practical test of the restaurant and boarding-house, of hash and hot biscuits, can not determine between them, and only the microscope can decide—then, in our opinion, oleomargarine will take its place among commercial products, and will not be compelled to take to itself the ancient and honorable appellation of butter. We commend to our butter-makers a reform in their methods of making and marketing the products of the dairy. Our suggestions are in the interest of the reputation of the honest cow, whom we honor, and on whose lacteal secretion the innocent and young of our human family so much depend, rather than on the average dairyman, who is oftentimes unclean in person and unsavory in reputation; who violates the cleanly instinct of the sweet-breathed bovine by confining her in filthy stables, by denying to her the freedom of the meadow and the luxury of clover; feeds her upon the slops of stills and kitchen swills; robs her of her young, and has her milked by the unsympathizing Portuguese, and her butter manipulated by the uncombed female with crimson hair, made into fraudulent pounds, and sent to conspiring middle-men with immoral views upon the laws of trade. We recommend to our California dairymen—who are a generation behind England, Switzerland, and Orange County in every principle and practice of cheese and butter-making—that they first inform themselves as dairymen, give us honest weight of clean-made butter, that comes from cows properly fed and kindly treated, before they demand that the publicans and sinners who keep restaurants and hotels should placard "oleomargarine." When this kind of legislation is entered upon, let the schedule of fraudulent, imitated, and spurious articles that are offered for sale in all departments of trade be largely increased. We suggest, also, that the ordinary farmer and fruit-grower give us good hay throughout the bale, good potatoes at the bottom of the bag, large apples and strawberries at the bottom of the box, and deserve their name of "honest farmers."

Some wise man has said: "There is always distinction in being at the top." It is an apothegm is true, and Adam found distinction in being the first man, Noah in standing alone upon Ararat, the sole survivor of a drowned world, and Alexander was at the top when he could find no other worlds to conquer—then why is there not also distinction in being at the bottom? The first scientist, navigator, warrior, rogue, or criminal, feels the pride of being first—standing first among his kind. The millionaire who gets the most money, or the politician who gets the most votes, have the same pride; then why not pride in being the poorest man, like Diogenes, or getting the worst political defeat that ever politician received, like Estee?

Stoneman received.....	90,554 votes.
McDonald	5,479
McQuiddy	996
Scattering.....	17
Total.....	97,046
Estee received.....	67,034

Majority of all over Estee.....30,012 votes.

The whole vote of the State was one hundred and sixty-four thousand and eighty. This is a worse flagellation than Judge Folger received in New York. Even poor little Black-and-Tan was beaten less than ten thousand votes. Estee has attained the distinction of being the worst defeated man in the whole catalogue of Republican catastrophes from Connecticut to California. When, in after times, men speak of the great tidal wave that swept the Northern States in the year 1882, they will state that the man who was drowned the drownedest, sank the deepest, and stayed longest under water, was the man who ran on the Republican ticket for Governor of California in this year of the great comet. The curious will overhaul the archives, and find that his name was Estee.

Embarrassments to business men do not come so much from tariff or revenue imports as from the uncertainty attending them and the fear of change. Our country was never more prosperous in all its great length and breadth, in all its industries and vocations, and among all its fifty-two millions of inhabitants, than it is to-day. The only present disturbing element in our business circles is the possibility of legislative action by Congress changing our revenue laws. Nothing definite will be accomplished this session. It will be an entire year before there will be a session of Congress in which any serious tariff modification will be attempted. In the meantime, the manufacturer and importer are greatly embarrassed because of the uncertainty of prices and markets, growing out of fear of change in the revenue laws. If the two houses of Congress, both parties concurring, would meet and unanimously resolve that for the next ten years there should be no repeal or change in the laws governing the collection of revenue—customs and internal—it would be a happy thing for the country, and more than anything else Congress could do would it contribute to our national prosperity.

The people of California seem to be utterly oblivious to the fact that we have produced from our midst a great man. Yet such is the fact. "Our Harry George," who founded the Post, "price, one cent," who rated our gas-metres, who made occasional Democratic speeches for us, who started a weekly paper or two, who insisted all the time that real estate should pay all the taxes, and who has written a book, is now ranked among the distinguished ones. We are glad of this, for we were becoming awfully tired of the recurring iteration of Spencer, Darwin, Huxley, and Tyndall. This quartet of philosophers had somehow absorbed all the learning and sense of the world. Jo Cook of Boston has been spinning around the outer edges, but has not succeeded in forcing an entrance to the inner sanctum of these monopolizing hierophants of learning. Now comes Harry George—"Our Harry"—with his modest bearing, his original theories of land tenure, and his new and practical views upon all the great questions of political economy. With an iconoclasm as audacious as original, he upsets the doctrines of Malthus, Ricardo, and Adam Smith, and flings his new book, "Poverty and Progress," in the face of all the time-honored traditions and abuses of the age. "Our Harry" has the courage of his convictions. He gets upon the crest of the Land-league wave, and is borne across the sea to the "most distressful country," and while there has the hardihood to differ with both landlord and tenant. He has the intelligence to perceive the demagogism of the Land-leaguers, the Parnellites, and all the blatant Irish agitators, and the nerve to combat their views. Harry had wonderful luck. He was imprisoned by the hated Saxon in one of his Bastilles. He became the subject of international anxiety. The haughty Briton was compelled to apologize. The American Government, through its Minister of Foreign Affairs, finding that Mr. George was satisfied, did not declare war. We are indebted to Mr. George—"Our Harry"—that war does not exist to-day; that the ocean is not incarnadined; and that exasperated ships, from their blood-stained decks, are not exchanging the death-dealing compliments of war. The London Times reviews "Our Harry" and his works. He rains newspaper articles like the dropping leaves of Vallambrosa. He piles upon Ossa of pamphlets, and crowns them with a Pelion of books. In a word, "Our Harry" has become famous, and we are proud of him. He enriches the vocabulary of illustrious authority—"Spencer, Darwin, Huxley, Tyndall, and George." Let Boston's Jo Cook go hang himself. George is from San Francisco. He may never return to us, and other cities may claim his birth and burial; but in none of them did this Homer in prose ever set up a newspaper, "price, one cent," or rate gas-metres for their inhabitants. We have other great men among us. The Philosopher Pickett is dead, but Horace Davis and Colonel Jackson still survive. The editor of the Call—the one that reviews the decisions of the Federal Courts—may blaze out from his impersonal obscurity at any time. Clarence Great-house, of the Examiner, Upton and the Reverend Bartlett, of the Bulletin, are our reserved forces of greatness that we are holding back for the ultimate astonishment of mankind. But really, badinage apart, Henry George has achieved for himself a reputation of which any of us might be proud, and yet we are not convinced that railroads, water companies, and personal property ought not to help pay taxes, nor are we quite ready to turn over the Argonaut's new building and lot on Dupont Street as the common property of all the impecunious loafers that belong to Henry George's Democratic party.

CHRISTMAS PRESENTS

— IN — — IN — — IN — FINE STATIONERY, NOVELTIES, FANCY GOODS

H. S. Crocker & Co.

215-217-219 BUSH STREET.

WE HAVE NOW ON EXHIBITION AN ELEGANT LINE
— OF —

Photograph Albums,
Autograph Albums,
Dressing Cases,
Work Boxes,
Jewel Cases,
Writing Desks,
Port Folios,
Portemonnaies,
Gilt Goods,
Opera Glasses,
Olive Wood Goods,
Glass Inkstands,
Nail Sets,

Russia Calendars,
Paper Weights,
Traveling Inkstands,
Card Cases,
Pocket Books,
Cigar Cases,
Cigarette Cases,
Glove & Handkerchief
Combination Sets,
Ivory Tusk Cutters,
Ivory Inkstands,
Drinking Cups,
Playing Card Boxes,

Bill Books,
Coin Purses,
Side Satchels, Necessaires,
Toilet Cases,
Odor Cases,
Stamp Boxes,
Solid Brass Goods,
Water Colors,
Traveling Bags,
Horn Goods,
Gold Pens,
Gold Pencils,

Plush, Leatherette & Alligator

The Choicest Selection of

Also Many Novelties in

Holiday Boxes, Christmas Cards, Writing Papers

WE MAKE A SPECIALTY OF

FINE STATIONERY

— AND —

Plain and Illuminated Papers.

Dance Programmes, Menu & Dinner Cards.

OPPOSITE MERCANTILE LIBRARY.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

A new story is told of an eminent English dramatist. He was about to read a new piece of his to the company of the—well, I will say a theatre—when, gravely rising from his seat, and opening a black bag he carried, he walked round the stage, and placed a new pocket-handkerchief in the hands of each of the actors and actresses—present, simply remarking: "Pardon me, but this is a tragedy!"

A gentleman who has recently taken up the study of French, and who loses no opportunity of airing the little knowledge he has thus far acquired of that language by translating and pronouncing such French words and phrases as his friends might encounter in his presence, was thus addressed by an acquaintance: "If you only knew as much English as you do French, you might get along right well."

Two rival belles at an evening party were seated in the conservatory with their respective cavaliers enjoying their supper. The gas was turned down somewhat, as it should be in a conservatory at an evening party. "My dear Julia," said one of the fascinating creatures, "how beautiful your complexion is—in this dim light!" "Oh, thank you," responded her rival, "and how lovely you look in the dark!"

A certain church in Michigan has been struck by lightning a dozen times, and now, whenever the preacher shows signs of getting long-winded, and passes from his "seventhly" to his "eighthly," the organist slyly imitates the sound of approaching thunder on the pedals. The result is that the preacher finishes his sermon and starts the doxology in an amazingly short time. The congregation has increased the salary of that organist.

An Editor, returning Home one Morning about Eight o'clock, was met in the Hall by his Vigilant Spouse. "Alas," she said, "that you have been Detained by another Breakage of the Press!" "Nay, not so," he Replied; "neither has the Press broken Down, nor have I been Detained by getting out the Weekly; but it was a small game of Ten-Cent ante which Hindered me." Hearing the which, the soul of George Washington turned over in His Grave and Muttered a Silent Benediction.

A West Pointer tells a comical anecdote of a very diffident young clergyman, who had been invited to dine with a professional brother, who also kept a young ladies' boarding-school. He was introduced to a bevy of the fair pupils in the drawing-room, and among them to a Miss M——, to whom he said, stammeringly: "A-a-a-a—Miss M——, a-a-I-I-I am not entirely unacquainted with you. I-I-I had the honor of sleeping with your father a short time ago!" If this isn't a rich specimen of the art of "scrapping acquaintance," we have never heard of one.

The Springfield Republican tells how a gentleman took from his pocket, after dinner, a pair of solitaires and passed them to his wife. "Humph," she said, "prize package, I suppose?" and passed them on to her son. "Dollar store, eh?" commented the youth. Papa smiled, and silently replaced the card in his pocket. A few days later mamma said: "Where did you get those ear-rings you showed us?" "Well, a man submitted them to me at the store. They were only nine hundred and fifty dollars, but you are such a poor judge of gems that I thought it wasn't worth while to give them to you."

A Chinese mandarin recently pronounced a decision as novel, if not as wise, as Solomon's famous judgment. A Chinese who had been drinking in a tea-house pulled out a dollar to pay the bill. The money was immediately claimed by a Hindu who was present, and who accused the Chinese of having stolen it from him. When the matter was referred to the magistrate, a second claimant appeared in the person of a Japanese. After profound deliberation, the mandarin came to the conclusion that there was not the slightest evidence to prove that the dollar belonged to either the Japanese or the Hindu; he decided, therefore, that it should be divided equally between them, and the Chinaman discharged from custody.

An Austin man, says the Texas Siftings, who made a prolonged trip through Mexico, gives us some interesting details of his trip. He says that when he was in the City of Mexico he was shown through some of the old buildings, convents, and jails that were erected by the Spaniards. In the wall of one of the ancient buildings he noticed a small opening, and he naturally inquired of his Mexican guide what it meant. He was told that it was one of the buildings in which criminals were walled up alive. "What was the use of that hole in the wall?" "Well, señor, you see, as long as the prisoner lived his food was handed in to him on a plate, and he handed the empty plate back; but when he handed the plate back with the food on it untouched, then the jailor knew the prisoner was dead already, and didn't give him any more."

A heavy snow had begun falling, and had soon completely blockaded a railroad, stopping the train with its single passenger car far from any place of habitation. There were a dozen or more travelers; but, as the prospect of relief within a few hours was good, they were taking the unpleasant situation calmly. Among them was a tall, lank, lay-preacher, whose countenance was chiefly remarkable for a preternaturally large mouth. Soon after the train came to a standstill, he arose at the forward end of the car, and, with his blandest professional smile, began: "Now, brethren and sisters, we've got to stay here shut up together for an hour or two—so let us make the best of it. I say brethren and sisters—because we are all brethren and sisters—ain't that so? We're all Christians, ain't we? Of course we are. Now, let us have a little experience meeting here. To begin with, we all believe there's nothing the Lord couldn't do, if he wanted to—we all believe that, don't we?" At this point a green-looking countryman started him by saying: "Waal, now, I dunno 'bout that. I think I know one thing the Lord couldn't do." "Oh, do you?" exclaimed the preacher with great delight; "do you indeed? Well, let's hear it. Speak up loud, and let us all hear what it is the Lord couldn't do." "Waal," said the countryman, with great deliberation, "He couldn't ha' made your mouth any bigger unless he'd ha' sot your ears back!" That ended the conference meeting.

TO HOUSEKEEPERS.

If you wish to use goods of full weight and absolute purity, see your grocer supplies you with

KINGSFORD'S

OSWEGO

STARCH.

ROYAL

BAKING POWDER.

WALTER BAKER & CO.'S

CHOCOLATE.

SMITH

BROTHERS'

PACKAGE

BORAX.

WM. T. COLEMAN & CO.

AGENTS,

121 and 123 Market Street,
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

ATTRACTIONS!

Our selections for the coming Holidays are exceptionally fine, and embrace the largest assortment of articles pertaining to the DIAMOND, WATCH, JEWELRY, and SILVERWARE business to be found in the State, and we are selling at close prices. All goods are marked in plain figures, from which no deviation is made.

GEO. C. SHREVE & CO.

110 MONTGOMERY STREET.

CHRISTMAS

BOOKS for OLD and YOUNG. BOOKS in CHOICE BINDINGS.
BOOKS ELEGANTLY ILLUSTRATED. BOOKS STANDARD and USEFUL.
BOOKS of PRAYER and DEVOTION. BOOKS for Autographs and Photographs.
RUSSIA LEATHER NOVELTIES. GOLD PENS and DIARIES.
BOXES of FINE STATIONERY. VIENNA INKSTANDS, bronze and gilt.
CHRISTMAS CARDS without limit. NEW YEAR CARDS for GENTLEMEN and LADIES.

AT BANCROFT'S.

THOMAS DAY & CO.

122 AND 124 SUTTER STREET,

Have now in a complete assortment of BRASS, BRONZE, BISQUE, FAIENCE, and other RARE ORNAMENTS for the HOLIDAYS.

The Choicest Designs in GAS FIXTURES and RARE LAMPS are arriving daily.

PRANG'S PRIZE X-MAS CARDS.

A full assortment of Prang's Cards may now be found in the Art and Book Stores.

FINE BOOKS.

Just received from Europe a choice collection of STANDARD and ILLUSTRATED BOOKS, in fine bindings, for the HOLIDAYS, which I offer at very low prices. A call is respectfully solicited.

MAX H. FAY, AGENT, IMPORTER OF FINE BOOKS,
Rooms 14, 15, 16, Thurlow Block, 126 Kearny St.
TAKE THE ELEVATOR. OPEN EVENINGS.

HOLIDAY-STYLE HATS

IN A LARGE VARIETY, AND A SPECIAL LINE OF

FINE CHILDREN'S GOODS,

JUST OPENED BY

C. HERRMANN & CO.

(HERRMANN, THE HATTER,)

336 KEARNY STREET, BETWEEN BUSH AND PINE STS.

OREGON IMPROVEMENT CO.

CUMBERLAND COAL,
LEHIGH LUMP and EGG COAL,
AT WHOLESALE.

SEATTLE COAL,

At Reduced Rates for Domestic and Steam Use.

MAIN OFFICE:

210 BATTERY STREET,
San Francisco.

DEPOTS:

Beale Street Wharf, San Francisco.
Foster's Wharf - - Oakland.

MAGNESO-CALCITE

BOND AND NOTE CASES,

JEWEL CASES,

HOUSEHOLD CHESTS,

ABSOLUTELY FIRE-PROOF.

D. S. BROWN & CO.,

36 California Street.

S. P. COLLINS & CO.

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL
dealers in Old London Dock Brandies, Port Wine, Sherries, and all the choicest brands Champagne, Apple Jack, Pisco, Arrack, Cordials, Liquors, etc. 330 MONTGOMERY, and 511 CALIFORNIA STREETS, S. F.

CALIFORNIA SUGAR REFINERY.
OFFICE, - - 325 Market St.
WORKS, Eighth and Brannan Sts.
C. SPRECKELS, President,
J. D. SPRECKELS, Vice-President,
A. B. SPRECKELS, Secretary.

CONSUMPTION.

I have a positive remedy for the above disease; by its use thousands of cases of the worst kind and of long standing have been cured. Indeed, so strong is my faith in its efficacy, that I will send TWO BOTTLES FREE, together with a VALUABLE TREATISE on this disease, to any sufferer. Give Express & P. O. address, DR. T. A. SLOCUM, 181 Pearl St., N. Y.

COMPOUND OXYGEN

NEW TREATMENT BY INHALATION, for Consumption, Asthma, Bronchitis, Dyspepsia, Catarrh, Headache, Debility, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, and all Chronic and Nervous Disorders. Prepared by DRS. STARKEY & PALEN, Philadelphia, Pa. Package contains all directions, and is easily sent by express, ready for USE AT HOME. H. E. MATHEWS, Forwarding Agent, 606 Montgomery street, San Francisco, Cal. Send for Free Pamphlets.

30 DAYS' TRIAL FREE.

We send free on 30 days trial Dr. Dye's Electro-Voltaic Belts and other Electric Appliances to MEN suffering from Nervous Debility, Lost Vitality, and Bladder Troubles. Also, for Rheumatism, Liver and Kidney Troubles, and many other diseases. Speedy cures guaranteed. Illustrated pamphlets free. Address VOLTAIC BELT CO., Marshall, Mich.

FITS

A Leading London Physician establishes an Office in New York for the Cure of EPILEPTIC FITS.

From Am. Journal of Medicine.
Dr. Ab. Meserole (late of London), who makes a specialty of Epilepsy, has without doubt treated and cured more cases than any other living physician. His success has simply been astonishing; we have heard of cases of over 20 years' standing successfully cured by him. He has published a work on this disease, which he sends with a large bottle of his wonderful cure free to any sufferer who may send their express and P. O. Address. We advise any one wishing a cure to address Dr. Ab. Meserole, No. 54 John St., New York.

Hunyadi THE BEST AND CHEAPEST

NATURAL
APERIENT WATER, János

"A natural laxative, superior to all others."

Prof. Macnamara, M.D. of Dublin.

"SPEEDY, SURE, & GENTLE."

Prof. Roberts, F.R.C.P. London.

"Relieves the kidneys, unloads the liver, and opens the bowels."

London Medical Record.

Ordinary Dose, a Wineglassful before breakfast.
Of all Druggists and Mineral Water Dealers.

NONE GENUINE BUT WITH A BLUE LABEL.

FOR SALE BY

RUHL BROTHERS

522 Montgomery Street,

SAN FRANCISCO

The periodical retirements of the Grand Opera House into obscurity are quite counterbalanced by the meteoric splendor with which it blazes forth at corresponding intervals. Its big nights are always nights long to be remembered, yet never before have its wide doors swung open to so expectant, so palpitating, and so financially valuable a crowd as on Tuesday evening.

San Francisco sought to do honor to the occasion in full dress, in so far as San Francisco ever permits itself to go. Absolute full dress it seems, so that unbonneted heads were rare, and not a décolletée dress visible, excepting in the royal box. The royal box! What a strange ring the words have in republican America! Yet not stranger than that the world has grown so small that royalty meets royalty upon its distant outpost; for, in our young, far-off city, have we not seen Christine Nilsson anointed queen by the divine gift of song and the acclamation of nations, making obeisance to the daughter of Queen Victoria, in whose veins run eight hundred years of kingly blood? We are good republicans all of us, with a very proper contempt for the inheritance of power; but there was just a little thrill for us in the situation, was there not?

A little spin around the world is such a small thing nowadays, that perhaps half the audience did not see Nilsson for the first time; but the untraveled few waited her coming with such a tension of interest as one rarely feels in a theatre. The personnel of a great artist has half as much to do with her success as her voice. The length of Parepa's girle was a fatal bar in her pathway; and the beautiful Marie Rozé would be the theme for a poet's song if she tipped the scale at two stone less. But as Christine Nilsson came smiling down the stage in her modified concert weeds, every woman in the house took in the idea at once that she was a woman of admirable height and superb figure, and with the carriage of a queen. She has the broad, serious brow and the earnest, strongly marked face of the north. There are those who call her cold, but it is a lingo with some people to call an artist cold. It is a vague, non-committal, metaphysical shrug, and is likely to give the uninitiated hearer the idea that the speaker has set up a little private Vestuvist on his own somewhere where he keeps an especial set of feelings at white heat. I have never seen this class of people much moved by music. They have an especial fondness for the bravura style, and when a prima donna acquires herself of a rondeau of trills, they will look around upon the audience with a curious triumph, as if it were of their own doing.

But they have no chord responsive to the noble simplicity of Nilsson's music, and grudge one of the few great ones her need of greatness. Cold? There is a magnetism in the noble presence of the woman, and a winsomeness in her simplicity which is beyond telling. It is too late to chant the praises of a world-known voice. But when, after singing the familiar aria, "Angels ever bright and fair," with such solemn sweetness as to make the great theatre seem like a cathedral, she responded to the very warmest of encores with a volk song of her native land, every heart in the throng went out to the woman. What it was all about none of us could tell, but that it was a song by a free-hearted, merry maiden in the beginning, and became a plaintive lay at last, we all knew as well as if it had been read to us; and the ripple of the simple accompaniment, played by her own hands, and the perfect expression of its rendering, were as harmonious as a poem.

I fancy Madame Nilsson intended to give an American volk song when she first made the "Old Folks at Home" famous. She must have learned by now that we have not yet a musical literature, even of the simplest, and that these spurious songs of an alien race are perhaps as nearly our volk songs as she could find. The intuition of the artist discovered as much long ago, and she has united with the pleasing melody an expression which the negroes themselves never give it. There is a plaintive quality in the negro voice—the involuntary cry, perhaps, of a long-oppressed race—which gives their singing always a touch of pathos; but there is something grotesque as well, especially in their long notes, in which the voice itself has a curious way of beating time; and in nothing is this peculiarity more familiar than in those two songs, "Down in the Cornfields" and the "Old Folks at Home." Although Nilsson sings the song without an introduced flourish as simply as the negroes themselves, the great art of the cantatrice is visible in every line of it. With the negroes it is only a soft, pleasing melody. With the artist, it is the inexpressible longing of true homesickness, and it goes straight to the heart. One wishes that the simple words might be left unmarred, for the mingling of the foreign intonation with the uncatchable negro dialect has a curious effect; yet, indeed, who would have wished it different when the last long note died into silence?

It was elaborately foiled by the sparkling "Jewel Song," given with a delicious freedom, an ease, a brilliancy which took the audience by storm. Madame Nilsson has essentially the dramatic temperament, and is curbed just so much by concert rules as to give her an ease and at-homeness which is not peculiar to the concert stage, so that she herself was but a degree less satisfying than she would be in opera.

In short, one of the few great geniuses of the earth has wandered this way, and has captivated us by her womanly graces as well as by her gift of song. That intention to please, which is always recognized and always appreciated, was easily discoverable in the making up of the programme, for did not the ever welcome Mendelssohn Quintet give us that fanciful concert, the Boccherini minuet, which the town went wild over, for it was thrummed on numberless pianos, though it sounds viley on anything but strings?

And Del Puente, a vigorous little man with the most robust of baritones, sang the perennial "Non e" and the caustic "Toreador" song, and, like our star, was much given to the dramatic action of opera, but reined in just sufficiently to give us the spirit of it, and became a favorite in five minutes, and made us all long with wild hopeless longing for a season of opera. And did not the tenor with the harsh, choking name—but never mind the tenor. That excessively nervous and most unhappy young man was forgotten so soon as he had succeeded in removing himself comfortably from the stage. Perhaps his voice and courage came back to him at the second concert.

Miss Hope Glenn—what a pretty name it is!—was not so fortunate as the others in her selections, and only touched them nearly in a little ballad given for an encore, and, for all that, it is a coquettish little trifle, sung with the reserve which seems to be characteristic of her. Miss Glenn's voice is of the purest contralto quality, and singularly heavy and deep. There is the ring of sympathy in her voice, but she has a passionless style of delivery, which does not seem to spring from lack of feeling, but rather from a certain shyness in losing the reins. Perhaps it is nothing more than the traditional concert style placed in such close and absolute contrast with the dramatic training of Madame Nilsson and Del Puente. At all events, she was not electric, though well liked and warmly encored. She had a floral welcome, too. An awkward usher presented her flowers at a malapropos time, and they stood unacknowledged among the flags of the Scandinavians, wrought in flowers and kept in countenance by the American eagle, which had been presented to Nilsson. It was indeed a gala night, for it always stirs the blood to see homage paid to genius.

The theatres will suffer for it, doubtless, but upon the principle probably that all the dentists go in one block and all the doctors in another, they are rallying for the Christmas time, and hope that the Nilsson season will get people into the habit of going. At the California the subtle announcement is made that this is the last week but one of the great melo-dramatic spectacle. The subtlety of it lies in the fact that the last week is written in capital letters, and but one in tiny italics, so that the hurried reader has a twinge as he glances that time presses, and that he must see "Siberia" if he is going to, or that he must have one last peep at the ballet, as the case may be. With the Christmas tide comes the "Naïad Queen," an apt reversal of the line: "Ring out the old, ring in the new;" for "Siberia" gives way to an old, old Christmas play in the "Naïad Queen," which will run but tamely after the flood of incident in "Siberia," but that it is intended to feast the eye rather than curdle the blood.

Georgia Cayvan takes flight, but only upon the promise to come back again, to take her part in the list of Madison Square plays sneered at by New York as being "strictly moral;" for it does appear that the pretty Baldwin is to open once again, and the people composing the new company are mostly those who helped the Madison Square to its initial success. The dark days would indeed seem to have passed for the theatres; for even the Bush Street Theatre, after all its auctions and dismantling, is renovating yet once again, and, after an all-star specialty company shall have run their dreadful career, will introduce the jovial Colville Company once again, while the minstrels pursue the tenor of their successful way undisturbed even by the Nilsson season.

BETSY B.

If Charles Locke brings to a successful issue his present negotiations with Joachim and Saint-Saens, to make a tour of the United States, it will be the greatest business stroke he has ever done. Joachim has many times vowed that he will never visit us, but money laughs at vows.

It is announced that Jay Rial has secured Baldwin's Theatre for four weeks about holiday time, in connection with Leonard Grover, for the production of two or three of Grover's plays.

Emerson's Minstrels, at the Standard, have made a new hit in "The Vienna Warblers" and "Innocence Abroad." There is a decided increase in their already large audiences.

"Siberia" will be continued at Haverly's California Theatre until the twenty-third instant, when it will be replaced by the "Naïad Queen," with Miss Louise Sylvester as Lurline.

Active preparations are being made by the proprietors the Grand Opera House for the production of the elaborate military drama, "Youth," on the twentieth instant.

Mr. Bartley Campbell left for the East on Wednesday afternoon. He gave a farewell breakfast to his friends a few hours previous to his departure.

Three new stars, Scott, Maxwell, and Haverly, have been added to Emerson's Minstrels at the Standard Theatre.

The Bert-Palmer Company, under the management of Ben Teal, has been playing at Los Angeles.

Minnie Palmer will play a four weeks' engagement in this city before going to London.

Leavitt's Specialty Company opens at the Bush Street Theatre on the 23d instant.

Miss Eleanor Calhoun has been engaged by the London Haymarket Theatre.

Herr Wilhelm will make another harvest of shekels in America next year.

CCLVIV.—Bill of Fare for Six Persons—Sunday, December 17.

Tomato and Rice Soup.
Escaloped Oysters.
Veal Cutlets, Cream Sauce.
Potato Vol-au-Vent. Lima Beans.
Roast Venison, Currant Jelly Sauce.
Lettuce, French dressing.
Ice Cream. Angel Cake.
Apples, Figs, Oranges, and Grapes.

ANGEL CAKE.—The whites of eleven eggs, one and a half cupfuls granulated sugar, one cupful pastry flour—measured after being sifted four times—one teaspoonful of cream of tartar, and one of vanilla extract. Sift the flour and cream of tartar together; beat the whites to a stiff froth. Beat the sugar into the eggs and the vanilla and the flour, stirring quickly and lightly. Beat until ready to put the mixture into the oven. Use a pan that has little legs at the top corners, so that when the pan is turned upside down on the table, after baking, a current of air will pass under and over it. Bake twenty minutes in a moderate oven. Do not grease the pan.

DOANE & HENSHELWOOD

We are now offering for the HOLIDAY SEASON a large and choice stock of Hand-run Spanish Lace Scarfs and Fichus, from the cheapest grades to the finest qualities. Also, every description of Ladies Neck-wear. Our stock of Handkerchiefs is much larger than former seasons, and comprises all kinds of Plain and Fancy Handkerchiefs for Ladies, Gentlemen, and Children. Gents' Hem-stitched Silk Handkerchiefs, in white and colors, at all prices. Elegant Brocade Velvets and Silks, and Bonnet Silks, in every quality.

Russia Leather Goods, direct from Vienna. Foster Kid Gloves, in every size, shade, and length, just received. Every pair warranted.

132 KEARNY STREET, THURLOW BLOCK.

Jay Rial will open the Baldwin Theatre on Christmas evening with a season of "My Son-in-Law." The Frohmans will resume the management of this house on the 22d of January, opening with "Esmeralda," to be succeeded by "Young Mrs. Winthrop."

—WANTED—A POSITION AS GOVERNOR BY A young lady just arrived from the East. English branches, German, and music. Best of city references. Address Governors, this office.

—MISS EMMA HOFF, CONTRALTO, LATE OF BERLIN, pupil of the Royal Conservatory of Music, Berlin, and of J. Stockhausen, instructs in Singing. Residence, 526 Post Street. Communications may be left at Gray's music store, 117 Post Street.

—HIS EXCELLENCY THE GOVERNOR-GENERAL of the Dominion of Canada, and his wife, the Princess Louise, visited on Thursday afternoon, with their full suite of ladies and gentlemen in attendance, the Diamond Palace of Colonel A. Andrews. All the members of this distinguished party expressed themselves as surprised at the beauty of the store and the variety and brilliancy of the costly display of merchandise. The royal princess was kind enough to remark that she had seen nothing in London more exquisite in point of taste, and that there was no establishment in Regent Street where more costly and beautiful jewels were attainable. The work in California gold quartz attracted the attention of the party as something quite unique in point of design and workmanship. The viceregal party will very shortly take its departure for the southern counties. The period of its return has not been fully determined upon, but when it does the Diamond Palace is promised a second visit, when Colonel Andrews hopes to supply its members with Christmas presents—the princess for her regal mother, and to the Marquis of Lorne for his relations in Scotland. Nothing could be more appropriate and elegant in this direction than the specialty of quartz jewelry which the workmen of the Diamond Palace produce with such exquisite taste and skill.

—THE ONLY HOUSE IN THE CITY WHERE THE best, freshest, and purest candies may be obtained is the manufactory of G. F. Roberts, corner Polk and Bush streets. Mr. Roberts is constantly inventing the choicest bon-bons, and has prepared for the holiday season a vast number of various delicious and original confectionery concoits. Besides this he has just received, direct from Paris, a stock of French bonbonnières.

The Latest Christmas Novelty.

AN ERRONEOUS IMPRESSION PREVAILS THAT THE California Christmas Card is printed. This is not the case, as all of them are hand painted—no two are alike, and the text can be put on to suit the purchaser. They are also adapted for New Year's cards, as well. For sale by Snow & Co., No. 12 Post Street, Masonic Temple.

Prang's Prize X-mas Cards.

A FULL assortment of Prang's cards may now be found in the art and book stores.

—USE SOUTH PRAIRIE COAL.

—THE BLOOD AT TIMES BECOMES LOADED WITH impurities, and moves sluggishly in the veins. This condition of the vital fluid can not last long without serious results. An alternative is needed to purify the blood and impart energy to the system, and there is none better than Ayer's Sarsaparilla.

—AN EFFECTIVE MEDICINE FOR KIDNEY DISEASES, low fevers, and nervous prostration, and well worthy of a trial is Brown's Iron Bitters.

—SKINNY MEN, "Wells' Health Renewer" restores health and vigor, cures Dyspepsia. $1, at druggists.

—IT IS THE COMMON OBSERVATION THAT the standard of natural health and normal activity, among American women, is being lowered by the influence of false ideas and habits of life, engendered by fashionable ignorance and luxurious living. It is a happy circumstance that Mrs. Lydia E. Pinkham has come to the front to instruct and cure the sufferers of her sex.

—REDDING'S RUSSIA SALVE HAS GENUINE merit, as all who use it will testify. Price 25c. Try it.

—LADY READERS OF THE ARGONAUT WILL REMEMBER that the place to buy colognes, perfumery, toilet soaps, brushes, sponges, cosmetics, etc., is at the elegant and well-stocked store of James G. Steele & Co., Chemists and Apothecaries, 635 Market Street, Palace Hotel, San Francisco.

—FOR THICK HEADS heavy stomachs, biliousness, "Wells' May Apple Pills," cathartic. 10 and 25c.

—MORSE HAS THE FINEST GALLERY IN THE world, 826 Market Street, (Phelan Block).

—DR. E. O. COCHRANE, DENTIST, 850 MARKET cor. Stockton (over drug store.) Office hours, 9 to 5.

—HEADQUARTERS FOR ELECTRIC BELTS, and appliances for the cure of nervous, painful, and debilitating diseases. Pamphlets, with full particulars, free. Address PULVERMACHER GALVANIC COMPANY, 513 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Cal.

—Go to Bradley & Rulofson's New Photographic Gallery, southeast corner Geary and Dupont streets.

ELEGANT CHRISTMAS CARDS CHRISTMAS BOOKS, PHOTOGRAPH & AUTOGRAPH ALBUMS, ETC., ETC.

The largest stock and finest display of Christmas Cards on the Pacific Coast. Samples of over 800 different styles arranged so that all can be seen, with the prices plainly marked on each. A visit to the store to see these Christmas Cards is a sight no one should miss.

COOPER'S BOOKSTORE,

No. 746 Market Street.

INDIA GOODS!

The steamers City of Peking and Gaelic have brought thirty packages more of FANCY GOODS, Rugs, Benares Wares, etc.

Which we now offer for sale at

No. 215 CALIFORNIA STREET.

This new assortment consists of many things not shown before, and is the last consignment of these goods expected. Everything must positively be closed within the next three weeks. Purchasers for the HOLIDAYS will find the articles in this collection most suitable at this season. Among the new goods received are:

Cutlery and Delhi Carved Solid Silverware.
Cashmere Shawls of rich and rare designs.
Chudda Shawls of various sizes and colors.
Cashmere Cloths, Cushions, Slippers, and Embroideries.
Chogas, Smoking Caps, Silver Bangles, Brass Bells and Vases.
Mosaic Glove Boxes, Writing Desks, Handkerchief and Card Boxes.

...ALSO...

DAGGERS, LANCES & SHIELDS

Of old and very rare workmanship, from Cutlery and Delhi.

Rare Carved Blackwood Furniture, Cabinets, Tables, Writing Desks, etc.

Benares and Moradabad Cups, Vases, Lotahs, and Salvers.

One bale of large and very choice Mooltan and Persian CARPETS.

For sale at 215 California Street.

GREETING!

Health, Longevity,
Prosperity, Unity,
Stability, Happiness,

To the Good People of the Pacific Slope is the salutation of the

CHICAGO, MILWAUKIE, AND
ST. PAUL RAILWAY

In coming hither to establish relations of amity and comity with you. Thanking everybody for the cordial reception extended us, we reciprocate with

THE GOOD NEWS

That the latest and best of all the links in the grand transcontinental railway chain is now completed, equipped, and opened for the transportation of persons and property in the safest, speediest, and most comfortable manner, over a track having no superior in excellent qualities, and in cars having no equal in all that renders travel pleasant. EXPRESS
TRAINS DAILY in each direction between COUNCIL BLUFFS and CHICAGO, with Pullman's unrivaled palace drawing-room sleeping cars and dining-cars without a peer on earth.

We offer inducements no one can afford to forego.
For information concerning the grand opportunity thus proffered, apply to CHARLES E. FAIRBANK, Traffic Agent—office, 138 Montgomery Street—or to general headquarters, Milwaukee, Wis.

S. S. MERRILL, Gen'l Manager.
J. T. CLARK, General Supt.
W. G. SWAN, Supt. Freight Traffic.
A. V. H. CARPENTER,
Gen'l Pass'r and Ticket Ag't.

X-MAS CARDS.

The largest and finest line in the city, wholesale and retail.
Specialty made of Cards exclusively.

J. J. EVANS, STATIONER,
436 California Street.

OPEN EVENINGS.

THE
AMERICAN SUGAR REFINERY
SAN FRANCISCO,
MANUFACTURERS OF ALL
Classes of Refined Sugars, including Loaf Sugar for export.
C. ADOLPHE LOW, President.
Office—208 California Street.

CHARLES R. ALLEN
Wholesale and Retail Dealer in COAL or Office by Telephone 308.
Agent Pittsburg Coal Mining Company.
118 and 120 Beale Street, S. F.

JOHN MIDDLETON,
COAL DEALER,
10 POST STREET,
AND 718 SANSOME STREET.

Coal at Lowest Market Rates.

GEORGE MORROW & CO.
(Established 1854.)
HAY, GRAIN, AND
COMMISSION MERCHANTS
SHIPPING ORDERS A SPECIALTY.

39 Clay Street,
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

Telephone No. 35.

C. ADOLPHE LOW & CO.
Commission Merchants,
SAN FRANCISCO.

OFFICE IN NEW YORK, 42 CEDAR
Street
Liberal advances made on consignments.

RUPTURE

Cured. Greatest Invention of the age. FIERCE & SIV
704 Sac. St., San Fran. Cal.

JNO. LEVY & CO.

118 SUTTER STREET,

Makers and Importers of Fine

JEWELRY,

Have made extensive preparations for the HOLIDAY TRADE,
and have added a most exquisite and odd line of NOVELTIES to
their already ELEGANT STOCK OF DIAMONDS, PRECIOUS
STONES, WATCHES, SILVERWARE, CARRIAGE and MANTEL
CLOCKS, OPERA GLASSES, FANS, etc., together making the handsomest display of goods ever exhibited in this city. We cordially invite an inspection of our stock, it being no trouble to show goods. Everything marked in plain figures and strictly one price.

WE SELL AT CLOSER PRICES THAN ANY HOUSE IN OUR LINE.

OPEN EVENINGS.

COLMAN BROS.

Stylish and Serviceable CLOTHING at Lowest Prices. In every department our goods are marked for sale at the merest advance over manufacturing cost. The pinnacle of success attained in our Men's, Boys', and Children's Departments. Our original styles at popular low prices, compelling buyers to patronize us. Satisfaction guaranteed. Established 1853.

LEADING CLOTHIERS,

SOUTHWEST CORNER MONTGOMERY AND BUSH STREETS.

N. B.—A large variety of Dressing Gowns and Smoking Jackets just received direct from Europe.

HOLIDAY GOODS.

Elegant Imported Leather and Fancy Goods, Beautiful Juvenile and Finely Bound Standard and Artistic Gift Books.
Christmas Cards, from English, European and American makers.

C. BEACH,

107 MONTGOMERY ST., OPPOSITE THE OCCIDENTAL.

OPEN EVENINGS.

Books

MAKE THE BEST HOLIDAY PRESENTS.

Holiday Books, Books in Binding, Illustrated Books, Juvenile Books, Christmas Cards, Glove Boxes, Dressing Cases, Fancy Articles, Useful Presents.

DOXEY'S,

23 DUPONT STREET, SAN FRANCISCO.

ESTABLISHED 1858.

W. K. VANDERSLICE & CO.

MANUFACTURING

JEWELERS AND SILVERSMITHS.

AMERICAN WATCHES, CHATELAINES in Gold and Silver. DIA-MONDS in single stones and matched pairs, and an elegant line of JEWELRY, including all the latest novelties for HOLIDAY GIFTS,
at the very closest prices.

136 SUTTER STREET.

OPEN EVENINGS.

If you desire to make an elegant
and useful CHRISTMAS GIFT, present your friend with a

WAKEFIELD RATTAN CHAIR.

This CUT represents our LADIES' ARLINGTON
ROCKER, No. 494, $8.50.

We have now in stock the finest assortment ever offered in this city.
Send for Catalogue.

WAKEFIELD RATTAN CO.,
644 Market Street.

"Dress Reform" CORSET.

Specially for Stout Figures, (worn with or without Straps,) by mail, $3.00. Send waist, hip, and bust measure.
Also, Shoulder Braces, Union
Under Flannels, Ladies' and
Children's Comfort Waists,
Bustles, Hose Supporters, etc.
Send for Circular. The only
Depot for these goods.

MRS. M. H. OBER & CO.
Boston Dress Reform,
326 Sutter Street,
SAN FRANCISCO.

An Elegant Corset to
Order for $4.

J. R. COWEN. J. W. PORTER.
COWEN & PORTER,
FUNERAL DIRECTORS,
118 Geary Street, San Francisco.
OPPOSITE STARR-KING CHURCH.

C. P. SHEFFIELD, N. W. SPAULDING, J. PATTERSON

17 and 19 FREMONT ST., SAN FRANCISCO.

J. M. LITCHFIELD & CO.
MERCHANT TAILORS,
And Dealers in Gents' Furnishing Goods,
415 MONTGOMERY STREET,
Bet. California and Sacramento San Francisco

"IT IS ALMOST HUMAN."
THE NORTON
DOOR-CHECK AND SPRING.

It is PERFECTLY SAFELY, and prevents the door from slamming shut, and absolutely imposes

D. S. BROWN & CO., No. 36 California Street,
Sole Agents for Pacific Coast.

CHRISTMAS CARDS AND FINE STATIONERY
AT DODGE, BROS. & SHREVE, 32 GE

THE TUNEFUL LIAR.

The Fatal Soap.

A little boy went out to swim,
And took a cake of soap with him,
And slipped each supple little limb.
And when he on the bank arose,
One long, last downward look he gave,
And then into the water dove.
And, trying to regain the top,
In vain, alas! he tried to flop—
He went so fast he couldn't stop!
His limbs were soaped from beel to bip;
He couldn't get a half-way grip—
For, every time he tried, he'd slip.
The water no resistance gave,
And so, beneath the murky wave,
He found a wet, untimely grave.
With thrilling, thundering, thumping thud,
He struck the misty, moisty mud—
And turkles fattened on his blood.
We dedicate this little hymn
To little boys of supple limb
Who soap themselves before they swim.
—Denver Tribune.

Making Up.

Defly the powder she applies
To neck and chin, to face and brow, (Alack, if the Public's piercing eyes
Could gaze on the leading lady now!)
First the powder, white as snow,
Till the skin takes on the lily's hue,
And not a line is left to show
Where Time has drawn his pencil through.
Next, from its quaint, metallic case
She takes the rouge—but not too much—
And straightway on the lily face
The roses bloom beneath her touch.
No vulgar daub of common red
Is that which beautifies her lips,
But just the warm rich tint instead,
Which Nature's self could scarce eclipse.
And now, with dextrous hand she draws
The eyebrows, arched and delicate,
In strict accord with Beauty's laws,
Not curved too much, nor yet too straight;
The lashes, then, are penciled dark,
And just beneath is traced a line—
You scarce detect it now, but mark
How large her eyes, and how they shine!
This mass of wavy, golden hair—
She does it as she does a dress;
'Tis false, but what of that? 'Tis fair—
Is she who wears it more or less?
Now comes the lacing and the hose,
The buttoning of dainty shoes,
And things whereof no poet knows
Who cultivates a modest mien!
So ends the "making up" at last—
And there your Juliet stands complete;
You know her rosy cheeks are past,
That when you meet her on the street
She looks her nearly two-score years—
You know all this, and yet, just now,
You'd swear she is what she appears—
That Time's the cheat, and not her brow!
—New York Clipper.

A Grand, Sweet Song.

Be good, fair maid, and let who will be clever,
Cut your hang even and be ever gay;
And you will get a watch with patent lever
Double-jeweled action from papa some day.
—Kingsley modernized by Puck.

Three Troubles

Three carpets bung waving abroad in the breeze—
Abroad in the breeze as the sun went down;
And three husbands, with patches of dirt on their knees,
Whacked wbacks that were beard for miles up and down.
For men must work and women must clean,
And the carpets be beaten, no matter how mean,
While the neighbors do the hosing.

Three housewives leaned out of their windows raised—
Of their windows raised, where the light streamed in;
And they scrubbed and scrubbed, till their heads grew dazed,
And their ears were filled with a horrible din;
For the pots will fall, and the kettles go hang,
And hoilers refuse in the attic to hang,
While the husbands do the swearing.

Three husbands went out in the haymows to hide—
In the baymows to hide where their wives ne'er looked.
Each said, as he rolled himself o'er on his side:
"I guess I will snooze, for I know I am booked;
For men will swear, but women may dust;
And before I move that stove that I must I'll stay right here till morning."

Three judges sat on their benches to judge
Three cases that came from a house-cleaning row.
The parties asserted they never would budge,
But wanted divorces "right here and right now."
So the men went off and the women went home,
And hereafter will do their house-cleaning alone,
While their former partners snicker.
—Yonkers Statesman.

McButler and the Witches.

SCENE.—A Blasted Heath.
FIRST WITCH.—(N. Y. Democracy.) All hail,
Macben, all hail to thee, thane of Boston.
SECOND WITCH.—(Penn. Democracy.) All hail,
Macben, hail to thee, Governor of Massachusetts.
THIRD WITCH.—(Mass. Democracy.) All hail,
Macben, that shall be President hereafter!
MACBEN: That's all very well; but I guess the Southern Macduff won't swallow ME!
—Puck.

STRENGTHENING TONIC, FREE FROM alcohol, cures dyspepsia, and similar diseases never been equalled. Brown's Iron

MRS. LYDIA E. PINKHAM, OF LYNN, MASS.,

WOMAN'S SYMPATHIZER WITH WOMAN.
Health of Woman is the Hope of the Race.

LYDIA E. PINKHAM'S VEGETABLE COMPOUND.
Is a Positive Cure
for all those Painful Complaints and Weaknesses
so common to our best female population.
It will cure entirely the worst form of Female Complaints, all ovarian troubles, inflammation and Uterine tumor, Falling and Displacements, and the consequent Spinal Weakness, and is particularly adapted to the Change of Life.
It will dissolve and expel tumors from the uterus in an early stage of development. The tendency to cancerous humors there is checked very speedily by its use.
It removes faintness, flatulency, destroys all craving
for stimulants, and relieves weakness of the stomach.
It cures Bloating, Headaches, Nervous Prostration, General Debility, Sleeplessness, Depression and Indigestion.
That feeling of bearing down, causing pain, weight
and backache, is always permanently cured by its use.
It will at all times and under all circumstances act in harmony with the laws that govern the female system.
For the cure of Kidney Complaints of either sex this Compound is unsurpassed.
LYDIA E. PINKHAM'S VEGETABLE COM-POUND is prepared at 233 and 235 Western Avenue, Lynn, Mass. Price $1. Six bottles for $5. Sent by mail in the form of pills, also in the form of lozenges, on receipt of price, $1 per box for either. Mrs. Pinkham freely answers all letters of inquiry. Send for pamphlet. Address as above. Mention this Paper.
No family should be without LYDIA E. PINKHAM'S
LIVER PILLS. They cure constipation, biliousness, and torpidity of the liver. 25 cents per box.
Sold by all Druggists. —

AYER'S SARSAPARILLA,
For Purifying the Blood.

This compound of the vegetable alteratives, Sarsaparilla, Dock, Stillingia, and Mandrake, with the Iodides of Potash and Iron, makes a most effectual cure of complaints affecting the blood.
It purifies the blood, purges out the lurking humors in the system that undermine health and settle into troublesome disorders. Eruptions on the surface of humors that should be expelled from the blood. Internal derangements are the determination of these same humors to some internal organ or organs, whose action they derange, and whose substance they disease and destroy. AYER'S SARSAPARILLA expels these humors from the blood. When they are gone, the disorders they produce disappear, such as Ulcerations of the Liver, Stomach, Kidneys, Lungs, Eruptions and Eruptive diseases of the Skin, Rose or Erysipelas, Pimples, Pustules, Blisters, Boils, Tumors, Tetters and Salt Rheum, Scald Head, Ringworm, Ulcers and Sores, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, Pain in the Bones, Side and Head, Female Weakness, Sterility, Dropsy, Dyspepsia, Emaciation, and General Debility.
With their departure health returns.

PREPARED BY
DR. J. C. AYER & Co., Lowell, Mass.
PRACTICAL AND ANALYTICAL CHEMISTS.
Sold by all Druggists and Dealers in Medicines.

ALASKA
COMMERCIAL CO.

No. 310 SANSOME STREET,
WHOLESALE DEALER IN FURS
SAUEL P. MIDDLETON, AUCTIONEER.
JOHN MIDDLETON & SON,
Stock, Real Estate, and General
AUCTIONEERS.
116 Montgomery Street,
Occidental Hotel Block SAN FRANCISCO,

STRONG FACTS!

A great many people are asking what particular troubles BROWN'S IRON BITTERS is good for.

It will cure Heart Disease, Paralysis, Dropsy, Kidney Disease, Consumption, Dyspepsia, Rheumatism,
Neuralgia, and all similar diseases.

Its wonderful curative power is simply because it purifies and enriches the blood, thus beginning at the foundation, and by building up the system, drives out all disease.

A Lady Cured of Rheumatism.

Baltimore, Md., May 7, 1880.
My health was much shattered by Rheumatism when I commenced taking Brown's Iron Bitters, and I scarcely had strength enough to attend to my daily household duties.
I am now using the third bottle and I am regaining strength daily, and I cheerfully recommend it to all.
I cannot say too much in praise of it. Mrs. MARY E. BRASHEAR, 173 Presmanst.

Kidney Disease Cured.

Christiansburg, Va., 1881.
Suffering from kidney disease, from which I could get no relief, I tried Brown's Iron Bitters, which cured me completely. A child of mine, recovering from scarlet fever, had no appetite and did not seem to be able to eat at all. I gave him Iron Bitters with the happiest results.
J. KYLE MONTAGUE.

Heart Disease.

Vine St., Harrisburg, Pa.
Dec. 2, 1881.
After trying different physicians and many remedies for palpitation of the heart without receiving any benefit, I was advised to try Brown's Iron Bitters. I have used two bottles and never found anything that gave me so much relief.
Mrs. JENNIE HESS.

For the peculiar troubles to which ladies are subject, BROWN'S IRON
BITTERS is invaluable. Try it.

Be sure and get the Genuine.

ONE MILLION COPIES SOLD!
Everybody Wants It!
Everybody Needs It!

KNOW THYSELF.
The untold miseries that result from indiscretions in early life may be alleviated and cured. Those who doubt this assertion should purchase the new medical work published by the Peabody Medical Institute, Boston, Mass.

THE SCIENCE OF LIFE, OR SELF-PRESERVA-TION.

Exhausted Vitality, Nervous and Physical Debility, Premature Decline in Man, or Vitality impaired by too close application to business, may be restored, and manhood regained.

Two hundred and fifty-eighth edition, revised and enlarged, just published. It is a standard medical work, the best in the English language, written by a physician of great experience, to whom was awarded a gold and jeweled medal by the National Medical Association. It contains beautiful and very expensive engravings, 300 pages, more than 125 valuable prescriptions for all forms of diseases, acute and chronic, the result of many years of extensive and successful practice, any one of which is worth ten times the price of the book. Bound in beautiful French cloth, embossed, full gilt. Price, only $1.25, by mail, securely sealed, postpaid, on receipt of price. Illustrated sample, 6 cents. Send now.

THE SCIENCE OF LIFE, OR SELF-PRESERVA-TION.

Is beyond all comparison the most extraordinary work on Physiology ever published. There is nothing whatever that the married or single can either require or wish to know but what is fully explained.—London Lancet.

THE SCIENCE OF LIFE, OR SELF-PRESERVA-TION.

Is a marvel of art and beauty, warranted to be a better medical book in every sense than can be obtained elsewhere for double the price, or the money will be refunded in every instance.—Author.

N. B.—YOUNG and MIDDLE-AGED MEN can save much time, suffering, and expense by reading the Science of Life, or conferring with the author, who may be consulted on all diseases requiring skill and experience. Address
PEABODY MEDICAL INSTITUTE,
Or W. H. PARKER, Jr. D.,
4 Bulfinch Street, Boston, Mass.

THUNDER POWDER COMPANY.

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco,
California; location of works, Alameda County, California.
Notice.—There are delinquent upon the following described stock, on account of assessment (No. 1) levied on the fifteenth day of August, 1882, the several amounts set opposite the names of the respective shareholders, as follows:

Name	Cert.	No.	Amount.
Charles DeLacy.....	3	Shares.	$2 00
Charles DeLacy, Trustee..	37	10,000	4,000 00
Charles DeLacy, Trustee..	73	200	80 00
Charles DeLacy, Trustee..	74	300	120 00
Charles DeLacy, Trustee..	79	14,995	5,998 00
Charles DeLacy, Trustee..	87	6,000	2,400 00
F. M. Pixley.....	4	5	not issued 2 00
F. M. Pixley, Trustee....	5	995	do 398 00
W. W. Dodge.....	6	5	do 2 00
W. W. Dodge, Trustee....	7	995	do 398 00
E. G. Waite.....	8	5	do 2 00
E. G. Waite, Trustee.....	9	2,495	do 998 00
Geo. W. Prescott.....	10	5	do 2 00
Geo. W. Prescott, Trustee..	11	995	do 398 00
Wm. Sherman.....	12	5	do 2 00
Wm. Sherman, Trustee....	13	2,495	do 998 00
R. M. Anthony, Trustee..	14	1,000	do 400 00
John A. Benson, Trustee..	15	2,000	do 800 00
Theodore Wagner, Trustee	16	1,000	do 400 00
M. Baldrige, Trustee.....	17	1,500	not issued 600 00
Fred'k Lux, Trustee.....	18	1,000	do 400 00
Charles Camden, Trustee..	19	2,000	do 800 00
Jackson Hart, Trustee....	20	1,000	do 400 00
R. D. Lennox, Trustee....	22	500	do 200 00
Daniel Gorham, Trustee..	23	500	do 200 00
Theodore Greene, Trustee.	24	1,000	do 400 00
Eugene L. Sullivan, Trust.	25	2,000	do 800 00
Walter Mead, Trustee....	26	500	not issued 200 00
J. H. Fish, Trustee.....	27	500	do 200 00
F. E. Frasier, Trustee....	28	1,000	do 400 00
F. E. Frasier, Trustee....	29	1,000	do 400 00
T. E. Frasier, Trustee....	30	1,000	do 400 00
L. C. Kiel, Trustee.....	31	1,000	do 400 00
Chas. S. Neal.....	32	5	do 2 00
Wm. F. Flick.....	33	5	do 2 00
Chas. H. Hopkins.....	34	5	do 2 00
Wm. Wilson.....	35	5	do 2 00
Benj. Teal.....	36	5	do 2 00
F. C. Kiel, Trustee.....	37	1,000	do 400 00
F. C. Kiel, Trustee.....	38	1,000	do 400 00
Wm. Heick Trustee.....	39	1,000	do 400 00
Wm. Heick, Trustee.....	40	1,000	do 400 00
F. M. Pixley, Trustee....	56	1,000	not issued 400 00
John F. Baxter, Trustee..	57	3,000	do 1,200 00
David S. Sherman, Trust.	58	3,000	do 1,200 00
W. H. Campbell, Trustee.	59	1,000	do 400 00
R. N. Bourne, Trustee....	61	500	do 200 00
Theodore Wagner, Trustee	60	500	do 200 00
Geo. E. Barnes, Trustee..	62	200	do 80 00
Wm. Wilson, Trustee....	63	100	do 40 00
L. E. Crane, Trustee.....	64	50	do 20 00
S. B. Herriman, Trustee..	65	50	do 20 00
A. P. Banton, Trustee....	66	50	not issued 20 00
W. W. Glazier, Trustee..	67	50	do 20 00
H. W. Newbauer, Trustee	80	250	do 100 00
L. Hafen, Trustee.....	81	250	do 100 00
Theodore Wagner, Trustee	85	1,000	do 400 00
Matthew Clark, Trustee..	103	500	do 200 00
Jas. S. Porteous, Trustee..	110	500	do 200 00
Thos. Legg, Trustee.....	104	100	do 40 00

And in accordance with law, and an order of the Board of Directors made on the fifteenth day of August, 1882, so many shares of each parcel of such stock as may be necessary will be sold at public auction at the company's office,
No. 606 Montgomery Street, Room 5, San Francisco, California, on Monday, the ninth day of October, 1882, at the hour of one o'clock P. M. of said day, to pay said delinquent assessment thereon, together with costs of advertising and expenses of the sale. C. M. OAKLEY, Secretary
Office—Room 5, Sherman Building, No. 606 Montgomery
Street, San Francisco, California.

POSTPONEMENT.—The sale day of the above delinquent stock is hereby postponed until the sixteenth (16th) day of October, 1882, at the same place and hour. By order of the Board of Directors.
C. M. OAKLEY, Secretary.

POSTPONEMENT.—The sale day of the above delinquent stock is hereby postponed until the thirtieth (30th) day of October, 1882, at the same place and hour. By order of the Board of Directors.
C. M. OAKLEY, Secretary.

POSTPONEMENT.—The sale day of the above delinquent stock is hereby postponed until the sixth (6th) day of November, 1882, at the same place and hour. By order of the Board of Directors.
C. M. OAKLEY, Secretary.

POSTPONEMENT.—The sale day of the above delinquent stock is hereby postponed until the thirteenth (13th) day of November, 1882, at the same place and hour. By order of the Board of Directors.
C. M. OAKLEY, Secretary.

POSTPONEMENT.—The sale day of the above delinquent stock is hereby postponed until the twentieth (20th) day of November, 1882, at the same place and hour. By order of the Board of Directors.
C. M. OAKLEY, Secretary.

POSTPONEMENT.—The sale day of the above delinquent stock is hereby postponed until the twenty-seventh (27th) day of November, 1882, at the same place and hour.
By order of the Board of Directors.
C. M. OAKLEY, Secretary.

POSTPONEMENT.—The sale day of the above delinquent stock is hereby postponed until the eleventh (11th) day of December, 1882, at the same place and hour. By order of the Board of Directors.
C. M. OAKLEY, Secretary.

POSTPONEMENT.—The sale day of the above delinquent stock is hereby postponed until the second (2d) day of January, 1883, at the same place and hour. By order of the Board of Directors. C. M. OAKLEY, Secretary.

BONESTELL PAPER WAREHOUSE
411 413 & 415 SANSOME ST. S.F.
Importers of All Kinds of Paper.

J. C. MERRILL & CO.,
Shipping and Commission Merchants
204 and 206 California Street,
SAN FRANCISCO.
The Regular Dispatch Line of Packages to Honolulu, H. I.

R. H. McDonald,
President,
San Francisco,
Cal.

PACIFIC BANK
Established
1863.
Capital Stock
$1,000,000.00
Surplus 460,800.70

San Francisco, Cal., July 1, 1882.

We take pleasure in presenting for your consideration the following Thirty-eighth Semi-Annual Statement of the condition of this Bank:

RESOURCES.

Bank Premises.....	$150,000 00
Other Real Estate.....	12,825 35
United States Bonds.....	629,507 60
Land Association Stock.....	15,121 55
Loans and Discounts.....	1,755,072 80
Due from Banks.....	327,279 09
Money on hand.....	632,365 30

LIABILITIES.

Capital paid up.....	$1,000,000 00
Surplus.....	460,800 70
Due Depositors.....	1,953,672 80
Due Banks.....	327,279 09
Dividends unpaid.....	134 50
	$3,752,099 09

This Bank has special facilities for doing all kinds of banking business.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—OFFICE OF
the Silver King Mining Company, San Francisco, Dec. 5, 1882.—At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the above-named Company held this day, a Dividend (No. 35) of Twenty-five Cents (25c.) per share was declared, payable on Friday, Dec. 15th, 1882, at the office of the Company, Room 19, 328 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California. Transfer books will close Dec. 9, 1882, at 3 P. M. JOSEPH NASH, Sec.

POTOSI MINING COMPANY
Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Storey County, Nevada.
Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Directors held on the 22nd day of November, 1882, an assessment (No. 10) of twenty-five cents per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately, in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 79, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on Wednesday, the twenty-seventh day of December, 1882, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction; and unless payment is made before, will be sold on Wednesday, the 17th day of January, 1883, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.
W. E. DEAN, Secretary.
Office—Room 79, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco Cal.

BEST AND BELCHER SILVER
Mining Company—Location of works, Virginia City, Storey County, Nevada. Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Directors, held on the eighteenth (18th) day of November, 1882, an assessment (No. 25) of Fifty (50c) Cents per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately, in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room No. 29, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on Friday, the 22d day of December, 1882, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction; and unless payment is made before, will be sold on Thursday, the 11th day of January, 1883, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.
WILLIAM WILLIS, Secretary.

Office—Room No. 29 Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

CALIFORNIA MINING COMPANY.
Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 21st day of November, 1882, an assessment (No. 6) of Twenty (20) Cents per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately, in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room No. 23, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the 29th day of December, 1882, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction; and unless payment is made before, will be sold on Friday, the 26th day of January, 1883, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.
C. P. GORDON, Secretary.

Office—Room 23, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery St., San Francisco Cal.

SIERRA NEVADA SILVER MINING
Company. Location of principal place of business San Francisco, California—Location of works, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Trustees, held on the 8th day of December, 1882, an assessment (No. 75) of One Dollar per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, 309 Montgomery Street, Room 37, Nevada Block, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the eleventh day of January, 1883, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction; and, unless payment is made before, will be sold on Tuesday, the 30th day of January, 1883, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.
E. L. PARKER, Secretary.

Office—Room 57, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

FAMILIES LEAVING THE CITY.

FURNITURE, TRUNKS, PIANOS,
PICTURES, CARPETS stored and taken care of. Having no rent to pay, we store goods low. Advances made. References, dating back 21 years, given.
H. WINDEL & CO. 310 Stockton Street.

NOVELTIES FOR THE HOLIDAYS.

LOUIS BRAVERMAN & CO.

119 MONTGOMERY STREET,

Invite public attention to the finest and best selected stock of Novelties in WATCHES, DIAMONDS, JEWELRY, SILVERWARE, and FRENCH CLOCKS ever exhibited here. Direct importation in every branch enables us to sell goods at lower prices than any house in the city.

Every description of fine DIAMOND WORK and JEWELRY manufactured to order.

STORE OPEN EVERY EVENING DURING DECEMBER.

PIANOS

HENRY F. MILLER, OF BOSTON,
HEMME & LONG, OF SAN FRANCISCO,
GROVESTEEN & FULLER, OF NEW YORK,
TAYLOR & FARLEY ORGANS.

WOODWORTH, SCHELL & CO.,
Sole Agents, 105 Stockton Street, San Francisco.

PIANOS TO RENT.

THE CALIFORNIA FURNITURE MANUFACTURING COMPANY

invite the public to visit their

WAREROOMS, 220 TO 226 BUSH STREET

And inspect their

NEW GOODS

Which constitute

THE FINEST DISPLAY OF FURNITURE

Ever shown on this Coast, and which cannot be excelled for Variety and Beauty upon this Continent.

Bring your Friends along. The Rich can gratify their Tastes; the Poor can supply their Wants.

THE CALA. FURNITURE MFG CO., 220 TO 226 BUSH ST.

MUSICAL BOXES.

M. J. PAILLARD & CO., 23 Dupont Street, San Francisco, Manufacturers and Importers. A. E. ZUILLERAT, Exclusive Agent. Musical Boxes repaired.

KNABE PIANOS

"I have never seen their equal."—Clara Louise Kellogg.

A. L. Bancroft & Co., 721 Market St., S. F., Sole Agents.

FOR FINE HOLIDAY WINES, J. CUNDLACH & CO.

Cor. Market and Second,
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

J. W. EVANS,
29 Post Street, San Francisco.

NABOB SAUCE

TRADE-MARK.

A Most Delicious Tonic.

THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY

For 1883 will contain

Contributions in almost every number by

OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES,

Author of "The Autocrat of the Breakfast Table," etc.

"Michael Angelo, a Tragedy,"

Which was left complete by

HENRY W. LONGFELLOW,

And which will run through three numbers of the magazine, beginning with January.

"The Ancestral Footstep,"

Outlines of an exceedingly interesting Romance, from the manuscript of

NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE.

"Daisy Miller, a Comedy,"

By HENRY JAMES JR.,

A dramatization, with important alterations, of his very popular story, "Daisy Miller."

Stories, Essays, Sketches, and Poems by

JOHN G. WHITTIER,
WILLIAM D. HOWELLS,
CHARLES DUDLEY WARNER,
SARAH ORNE JEWETT,
RICHARD GRANT WHITE,
ROSE TERRY COOKE,
HORACE E. SCUDDER,
GEORGE P. LATHROP,
HARRIET W. PRESTON,

And many others of the best American writers.

The Atlantic furnishes its readers in the course of a year as much reading as is contained in Twenty Ordinary Volumes of 300 pages each.

TERMS: $4.00 a year in advance, postage free; 35 cents a number. With superb life-size portrait of Longfellow, Bryant, Whittier, Lowell, Holmes, or Emerson, $5.00; with two portraits, $6.00; with three, $7.00; with four, $8.00; with five, $9.00; with all six, $10.00.

Remittances should be made by Money-order, Draft, or Registered Letter, to

HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN & CO.
4 Park Street, Boston, Mass.

ART-PAINTED, PLAIN and GLAZED

TILES

For Decorations.

W. W. MONTAGUE & CO
110 to 118 Battery Street.

CRUSHED INDIAN.

A NEW AND DELICIOUS PREPARATION
FROM CORN, FOR BREAKFAST. IT COOKS
THOROUGHLY IN A FEW MINUTES.

TRY IT.
FOR SALE BY ALL
GROCERS.

THE ARGONAUT

CHRISTMAS

The Argonaut.

VOL. XI. NO. 26.

SAN FRANCISCO, DECEMBER 23, 1882.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

Courting à Fairy Queen.

THE VERACIOUS HISTORY OF A VERY DELICATE AFFAIR OF THE STAGE.

I CONSIDER myself fortunate that my hero was all that he was—the acknowledged beau of Petaluma. Josh Hawkins had no need of his father's influence and standing, as one of the smartest and most successful ranchers of the county, to sustain him in his proud and lofty position. He was the beau of the county, and the fact had never been disputed since he had so crushed the aspirations of Dick Weathersby, a clerk in a Petaluma store. Dick, too, had the supposed advantage of city training, having lived in Petaluma since a boy, while Josh had lived most of his life on the ranch, passing only a few gay and rollicking weeks in Petaluma, about fair time, each year, when he made things lively, I can assure you. Dick one time persuaded his uncle, living a short distance out of town, to give him a party—which, up to that time, was quite the most swell affair of the kind the county had record of. The Santa Rosa band was hired for the dancing; the supper was supplied, on a carte blanche order, by a Petaluma bakery; and Dick danced three times with the belle of the ball, with whom Josh had only one dance, although it was known he was as good as keeping company with her.

But, gracious! if I could only give you the details of the party at Josh's house the very next month. The musicians were from San Francisco, and after supper cigars were passed around to the gentlemen on the stoop, much to the horror, but much more to the admiration—for Josh—of the ladies present.

"That's just the way they do at the bay," remarked a friend of Josh who had attended a San Francisco business college for three months, and naturally knew all about such things. But what crushed Dick's aspirations and secured Josh his proud Petaluma prominence was this: Dick had allowed his Petaluma guests to go to and from his party as they best could. Josh brought and sent away his Petaluma guests in his own and neighbors' wagons. Josh not only danced three times with the belle, but it is known that she had remarked: "You can talk, but when it comes to doin' the grand and genteel, there ain't none of 'em can lay over Josh Hawkins."

I have said this much only out of the very happiness I feel that my hero should be such a swell.

Josh's father died just after having sold the ranch, for a good cash sum, to a wine-making company. Josh and his mother, by will, shared the property equally, and, as it happened to be cash, our beau saw an opportunity for realizing the one bright, glorious dream of his existence. It was a dream of extended conquest, of gayety and gas-lights, of theatres, late hours without limit, and without the necessity, either, of climbing up the water-spout over the back porch to get to bed undiscovered—a dream, in short, of life. He would be a city—a San Francisco—swell. Josh reasoned—and logically enough, too, so far as I can see—thus: If a fellow is a deuce of a big fish, a regular sturgeon among shrimps, in a small puddle, he must be something considerable of a fish in a pretty big pond. Not—I hasten to add—that Josh ever thought of San Francisco in this connection as a pond. Perish the thought! He thought of it as a roaring, boundless, mighty, and all-comprehending ocean. Still a sturgeon must be no small fry even in an ocean. Josh had never seen a whale.

So Josh came. The ferry-landing and street-cars; grand! The big hotel at which he registered; glorious! He walked abroad on Market and Kearny streets at night; terrific! He went to the theatre; dazzling! He was robbed of his pocket-money by a sad-eyed stranger, who offered him a three thousand-dollar lottery chance for a dollar and a half; dumfounding, sad, and peculiar! Now, Josh was a cute fellow and not slow to receive impressions, and it was not long before he realized that his dress was not quite the thing. There was a remarkable majority of men whom he met in the hotel and theatre who wore neckties, and Josh determined not to let any such little handicap as the absence of a necktie drag him behind in the race; so he entered a shop where, in passing, he had already been invited by the proprietor to "step inside undt ogsamine de goots." A more obliging and complimentary salesman he had never met, and before he left the store he was the possessor of not only a number of neckties, but of an entire new suit of clothes, hat, and boots. Josh ordered his purchases sent to his hotel, for he was going to the first performance of the Christmas play at the California Theatre that night, and he was determined to create an impression there if the power to do so lay in him. Josh wore a large red mustache, and on his chin what he called a "goatee"; likewise red. On his way to the hotel he concluded to let the barber have his way, and to have both of these extensive ornaments jet black; the barber assuring him that it was the proper thing—and charging him a dollar and a half for a bottle of the dye. After dinner—which he called supper—he dressed proudly in his new apparel. He wore—but I shall have occasion to describe his appearance later.

For the present, I turn to the even more pleasant task of introducing my heroine. What a charming task!—yet how hesitatingly the writer must ever approach it. Be she an ideal, or, as in this instance, a real person, the manner of her reception by those to whom she is introduced, rests with the sponsor—the writer. Surely, this is a delicate and responsible undertaking. We know our own heroines to possess all the graces and virtues, yet, bunglingly, we may impress them upon our reader's mind as creatures much less than perfect. We know them, through our accurate information, to be just what the reader must be pleased with, yet how frequently the reader, through our poor drawing and coloring, objects to the portrait! If in saying this much I have delicately and cleverly hinted that Miss Orinda Blodgett, whom I now present is an unexceptionable heroine, I have accomplished the purpose I had in view. How can I sufficiently express my pride in the happy circumstance that Orinda was as much the belle of Milpitas as Josh was the beau of Petaluma?

But their circumstances were very much unlike. Orinda's father had bought his ranch when the San José Railroad on that side of the bay was projected. He had paid a highly prospective price—had discounted the future something like a half century; and with much inclination to bang around the Milpitas store and pose as the growling granger, things at the ranch were in a bad way. His family was increasing much more rapidly than his acreage of productive vines or trees, and Mrs. Blodgett seemed to remain perversely ignorant of the cost of providing for each successive youngest. That Orinda, or "Rinda," as she was called from the day of her baptism, kept her acknowledged place as the belle of Milpitas despite these discouraging circumstances, must be held to her credit.

There had been enough money left at the time the ranch was bought to buy a piano for the then quite young, but quite promising, Rinda, and that piano was not only her solace, joy, and inspiration, but it brought some pupils, who supplied her with the means of dressing as well as any of her rivals. There had been a pretty row when old Blodgett once suggested that Rinda might contribute at least as much as the cost of the piano toward clothing purchases for the youthful Blodgetts. Rinda, who was considered, not only by her family, but by a large circle of admirers, as the making of a great actress, raved around the house in high tragedy after that suggestion, and in such a manner that Blodgett fled to the store, and never returned to his family until ten o'clock that night—tearful, penitent, affectionate, mellow. I have said the piano was her inspiration, for the reason that it suggested to her another, a higher, and a better life. This was all the result of a remark of one of her admirers, who, after hearing her at that piano play and sing "Silver threads among the gold," declared that she did it better than a real actress he had heard sing the same song once in San José. That was the seed of her ambition to go on the stage; it was nurtured and brought into full bloom by two items she read in one copy of a San Francisco paper. One was that Patti had refused an offer by Manager Abbey of thirty thousand dollars for twenty performances in the United States; the other was an advertisement for one hundred young ladies for the Christmas spectacle of the California Theatre. Her mind fairly reeled under its contemplation of the possibilities suggested by these two fate-sent pieces of information. A single stage person in such demand that she could refuse a thirty thousand-dollar offer, and a chance to become a stage person opened to her—Rinda Blodgett—within two hours' ride of her home!

Her mind was made up. No longer should she submit to the mean and narrow confines of life suggested by seven five-finger-exercise pupils, three beaux, one South Methodist sewing society, and an uncertain miscellany of "parties." She scarcely dared to think of the greatness, the glory, the brilliancy of the life ahead. Thirty thousand dollars for twenty performances!

* * * * *

"Six dollars a week and costumes furnished. No pay for rehearsals, which begin this afternoon. What's your name?"

"Orinda Blodgett."

"All right. Six dollars a week, and"—The man was saying this to the woman who came next, and Rinda was shoved on into a crowd of women, to whom the same thing had been said before. He had not said it as though he was making an offer, but as though he was plainly stating terms to avoid future disputes, which, in fact, was the case.

Orinda was confused in mind and sick at heart. She had gone to the stage-door, as the advertisement directed, but not prepared for any such scene as this.

She expected to pass some kind of an examination, but whether it would be in the nature of a song, a declamation, or—about this last she had some confused idea—an exhibition of posing, she was undecided. She had stood for a long time in a line with other women. Some had giggled and joked with the shirt-sleeved man; some had given their names sullenly, and swore about the niggard pay. "Six, indeed! Never worked for less than ten!" Some, rather old, had passed in quietly and as a matter of course, as though they knew they were expected at this, as at every spectacle—as, indeed, they were, poor things.

And with thirty or forty of these—crowded in between dusty stacks, and piles, and walls of scenery, like great leaves of a book that had been read and laid away until partial forgetfulness would again make its pages almost a novelty; crowded there, hustled by roughly dressed men carrying some thin lumber in from the street; in the dark, and dirt, and dust, surrounded by women, most of whom she instinctively shrank from, with the terms of her engagement, six dollars a week, no pay for rehearsals, etc., confusedly tumbling about in her mind—Rinda could not suppress a sob as a thought of that thirty thousand-dollar contract crossed her mind.

"Sit down here, girl. What's the matter with you?"

Rinda "sat" down, for the reason that the person who had spoken had at the same time given such a sturdy jerk at the back breadth of her dress as to plump her on top of a chest, where the speaker was already seated. The speaker was one of the older women who had passed in as a matter of course. She was rather short and somewhat stout, and her face was not unkind, despite its innumerable tiny creases, which were not wrinkles, and its surpassing redness.

"What's the matter with you?—sick?" she asked again, peering into Rinda's face as well as she could in the half-light of the entrance.

"No," said Rinda, picking up a little spirit. "I'm only tired, and weak, and cold."

"What makes you weak?"

"I left home by the early train, before breakfast, and haven't eaten at all."

"Early train? Oakland?"

"No. Milpitas."

"Milpitas? Ha, ha!" the woman laughed hoarsely, but was looking sharply and curiously at Rinda the while.

"Why don't you want to tell where you are from?" she next asked.

"I did; Milpitas."

"Mil— Truly?"

"Yes."

"Oh, I didn't know people really ever came from there."

Mrs. Potter—that was the name of the middle-aged coryphée who had spoken to Rinda—had been what she was for a considerable number of years—both middle-aged and a coryphée. She had two daughters, who had also been coryphées for a number of years, though they were still young. Mrs. Potter and her two daughters emerged from their Clementina Street residence, as far as the public had knowledge of their movements, only when a spectacle requiring coryphées was "on" at some of the theatres. Every theatre-goer becomes dimly conscious that there are lots of such women in the city, and sometimes may wonder what becomes of them when all the spectacles are "off." I suspect it is best not to wonder. There was a male Potter attached to the Clementina Street household, whom no one ever saw except at such times when he got himself crazy drunk from absinthe-drinking, and sought the bosom of his family for the purpose of begging money, weeping, or kicking up a deuce of a row, as the spirit moved. This occurred once or twice a week when a spectacle was "on"; less frequently when all were "off." His whereabouts at other times was never inquired after.

I do not know what Mrs. Potter was thinking about as she closely examined Rinda, but whatever it was it resulted in her saying, finally: "I think you are square. Where are you stopping?"

Rinda had not thought of lodgings, and told the Potter so. "Then it's all right. You come and stop with me. You can sleep with one of the girls, and the other can sleep with me. If the old man turns up—well, the floor is too good for him. Come on."

As they edged out of the crowded entrance-way, Mrs. Potter spoke to two girls, dumpy like herself, who, staring at Rinda, followed. On the way to Clementina Street, Mrs. Potter made herself and the girls acquainted by name, age, and occupation, so to say, with Rinda, whom she asked: "You've never been on before, eh?" "On before?" Rinda said, puzzled. "On in a spectacle?"

"I never was an actress before," Rinda ventured, whereat the three dumpy Potters laughed immeasurably.

Madame Potter's interest in Rinda she explained satisfactorily when the family apartments were reached. Salaries for the ballet were so outrageously low, an honest person in that line of life was obliged to jump at any honest chance to increase the income. The honest chance Madame Potter now proceeded to jump at was to arrange that Rinda should stay with her during the spectacle's run, which would likely be eight weeks, and give her five dollars a week for the privilege. "That would leave you only a dollar a week, Miss Blodget," Mrs. Potter said, eying Rinda more critically now that the latter had laid off her shawl and hat; "but it will be more than that; for if you show up as well in shape-clothes as I should judge from what I see of you now, you can do the Fairy Queen—and that's ten dollars a week. There's but two or three lines in the part, but you're on for every curtain—central figure in all tableaux."

This speech, only half intelligible to Rinda, caused one of the Misses Potter to sneeringly remark:

"Now, maw, what are you stuffin' that girl like that for? She'd make a daisy fairy—she would!" Whereat the other Miss Potter was moved to violent guffaws.

"Maw" Potter, her temper not at all disturbed, answered thus: "Mr. Allup, the stage-manager, was complaining to me this very morning that there wasn't a decent fairy in the whole gang there this morning; but he hadn't seen Miss Blodget. 'Ballet material is none too good nowadays,' he says, 'and the other houses drawing on what supply there is makes it queer picking.' If you girls wasn't dumpy, like your maw, you'd been fairies long ago. But you're only fit for the march and pants parts, with nothing to do but to grin in 'em."

This speech was less intelligible to Rinda than the preceding one; but the Misses Potter, who might have been fairies long ago if they had not been dumpy, and who were increasing their dumptiness at that moment with much cold sausage, bread, and beer, appeared to understand all their mother said, and answered not.

The afternoon's events proved that the mature Potter's judgment was correct. It happened that the stage-manager had fixed upon only one point in regard to the Fairy Queen, which was, that she should be a tall, straight woman, who was either good-looking or could be made up to look so. The pictures he was preparing with which each act was to close were, as to the people on the stage, to be framed around a dazzling centre occupied by the Fairy Queen. As to Rinda, if I were permitted to describe her slangily, I would only say that she was a strapping tall girl, with a small head plentifully supplied with red hair, a small nose, large mouth, and rather big light-blue eyes. She possessed, in truth, just such physique and features as produce, when properly treated, exactly that kind of striking stage beauty that is at once the maddening despair and the joy of the male theatre-goer daft of ballet mania.

The week of two rehearsals daily was a hard one, but it passed quickly, making, of course, much change in Rinda, who, after the first bitter disappointment, was delighted with even the excitement of rehearsals, hard and dull as they were to the old hands, anxiously waiting for the fascination of the gas-light, music, full dress, crowd, and applause of a real performance.

The opening night came at last, freighted with more excitement for Rinda than the other Christmas eves of her life, taken all together, had brought her. Madame Potter made her up, after she had dressed for the stage; and never in her life was Rinda so surprised—at the change in herself no more than in the change in the puddy Potters. Rinda's face, throat, neck, arms, and hands were whitened by a liquid the Potter applied liberally with a sponge. After the lower lids of her eyes had been washed with a liquid that made the pupils expand startlingly, they were painted black—not shaded, but marked with a deep black band; the upper lids pinked, the eye-brows enlarged by other dense black marks, and the upper portion of her cheeks colored a furious scarlet. The effect, as Rinda observed it, when she got a chance at the mirror, was one of white background, black lines, scarlet patches, and eyes the like of which she had never seen reflected from her own mirror before.

"But if you could only see yourself from any part of the house, Rinda, my dear," said the Potter, who had become affectionate toward the Fairy Queen, "take my word for it, you will look stunning."

And the Potter was right. Rinda was discovered by the crowded house, toward the end of the first act, when the flats forming the back of a gorgeous scene were suddenly pulled off, disclosing more gorgeousness and Rinda, statuesque and—as the experienced Potter had foreseen—"stunning," in the midst of it all. An appreciative murmur ran through the audience, every opera-glass in the house was leveled at the Fairy Queen, who said something that no one heard, walked half way down the stage, struck an attitude the Potter had laboriously trained her in, was surrounded by a fluttering lot of ballet, and the curtain fell. Rinda had seen nothing, heard nothing, felt nothing during the whole time she was in sight of the audience; her brain was in a whirl, and a white wall of light, that seemed to come up over the foot-lights, shut out all sights.

But in the next act, in which she was on some time after being discovered, she did better: she gradually saw through the wall of light, and looking about, saw, for the first time since she had been in the city, her beau-ideal. Happiness! he was glaring at her through glasses, fixedly, uninterruptedly, and so continued to do whenever she was in sight. He was all that she, in her heart of hearts, had pictured a city swell to be.

He was radiant in hair that shone and was much puffed out; in mustache and beard jet-black, glossy, and waxed to exquisite points; in a very long light coat, and vest that showed a splendid depth and expanse of shirt-front, the upper portion of which was decorated with the dangling ends of a bright red necktie, and its entire length was made brilliant with green studs, set in elaborately embroidered holes.

His hands, both of which were used in holding his glasses, were set off with gloves of a lively yellow color, and, held under his arm, a tall and very much bell-shaped white "plug" hat completed so much of his costume as Rinda could see. Thus stood Josh Hawkins, utterly routed as to his heart, with a wild instantaneous love, kindled by the beauty and fanned by the glances of Rinda Blodget. Before the end of the last act his case excited the attention, not only of every one in the orchestra chairs and dress-circle, but was noted on the stage.

"That Blodget thing has mashed the guy with the white dicer, standing at the end of dead-head row," remarked one of the dumpy Potters to the other.

"But he's not a dead-head," the other replied, taking in the enraptured Josh at a glance.

I would not, if I could, depict the unhappiness of Josh for the next four or five days and nights. His enslaver was "on the stage," and that meant to him that she might as well be in the moon, so far as possibilities of acquaintance were concerned.

He could only stand in his accustomed place every night, devour her charms as transmitted through his glasses—rented, also, every night—and sigh and dream, but never hope. Never, at least, until the Thursday night of the first week, when, by accident, he observed a note attached to a bouquet which the leader of the orchestra handed to the première danseuse. "Why," he desperately asked himself, "if the leader of the orchestra was permitted to hand a bouquet and a note to the première danseuse could not he, Josh Hawkins, hand a bouquet and a note to Blanche Borrilli?"—for such was Rinda Blodget on the play-bill!

The idea worked itself out in his sleepless brain that night, and on the following night, dressed in a new, long, bright blue suit, he appeared in his accustomed place, standing close to the stage, bearing the largest bouquet that the florist could make hold together—for such Josh had ordered—attached to which was a large yellow envelope enclosing, alas! the literary outcome of Josh's love, hope, and previous night's sleeplessness.

Josh, visibly agitated, held the bouquet in one gloved hand and the opera glasses fixed to his eyes with the other, when the withdrawn flats disclosed the adorable Rinda. After three or four false starts, Josh finally crowded himself next to the stage, and, waving the bouquet aloft, looked meltingly at Rinda. A titter went round the house.

Josh, all unmindful, continued to wave the bouquet, and, as Rinda came down the stage to the spot where she attitudinized, Josh beckoned her wildly. The titter swelled to a general giggle. Rinda, gazing longingly, made a step toward Josh, but she was hemmed by posing ballet, and the curtain began to descend. She looked her despair only too plainly. Josh saw it, and became desperate. The giggle ran into a laugh.

In a rage of love and agonizing disappointment, Josh, when the curtain was more than half down, with a savage fling, threw the bouquet on the stage, yelling:

"That's for Blanche Borrilli, by gum!"

The bouquet, which was heavy, happened to strike the middle-aged Potter square in the back, and she, poised on one foot, with the other waving unsteadily high in the air, being unprepared for the blow, went sprawling at the feet of the Fairy Queen.

The laugh volumed into a perfect roar, but Josh, wiping the streaming perspiration from his red face with a purple silk handkerchief, only glared at the house. His was too serious a case to be laughed down. The amazed and prostrate Potter picked up herself and the bouquet at the same time. She was very, very mad. When she had partially recovered from the unexpected shock, and had the cause of the laugh and her fall explained to her, she looked at the note. Observing its address, she still held fast to the bouquet, and said sternly to the dismayed Rinda, in the dressing-room: "Well, I should say I have a right to read this note." Under the distressing circumstances it would have been hard to say what the Potter did not have a right to do with the note, and bouquet, too; so Rinda did not object when the middle-aged woman opened and read the note, which was as follows:

"If a humble, but honest, admirer
Could to such happiness dare aspire,
He would ask, Miss Borrilli, to say,
To meet you at some early day.

JOSH HAWKINS,
Address Palace Hotel, (late of Petaluma)."

The composition of this note had been at the cost of a night of mental agony to Josh, and, while he was enamored of its literary beauty, he felt dissatisfied with the description of himself contained in the first line. But the line was written, and he could no more change it, he felt, than he could the color of his eyes. The "humble, but honest," he knew to be poetical, yet he feared that it might convey an impression of a man very different from the wealthy swell he felt himself to be. After much thought and labored deliberation he had evolved the happy inspiration of adding the explanation, "late of Petaluma." That would set him right, he said to himself, for while there might be a Josh Hawkins, humble and honest, the sufficient reminder that it was the Josh Hawkins, late of Petaluma, was as good as adding "a swell, and wealthy," which all people, he further reasoned, must know. When Madame Potter finished reading the note, she said to Rinda:

"This person, who seems to be a very proper sort of young man, requests the honor of your acquaintance. As I understand this sort of thing, you had better leave the matter to me."

Rinda thought so, too, and though she was dying to see the note, which she knew to be from her beau-ideal, she did not, in view of Mrs. Potter's peculiar relations to the bouquet and note, dare to suggest anything regarding either that did not occur to that lady.

Mrs. Potter, muttering "from Petaluma, indeed, and to knock me over with his big cabbage of a bouquet!" left the dressing-room, and hurried the call-boy to Josh with a verbal message to "come at once to the stage-door." Everybody in the house saw the boy deliver the message, and every one knew perfectly well what the message was; and would have known even if they had not seen Josh precipitately follow the boy, his face in a happy glow, his white hat cocked triumphantly on the back of his head.

"Is this Mr. Hawkins?" asked Madame Potter, passing him at the stage-door.

"Yes, ma'am," responded Josh, his voice showing his disappointment at meeting a thick, dumpy woman, with an ulster thrown over her brief stage-clothes, instead of the divinely statuesque Borrilli.

"Then come this way, quick!" the Potter said, taking his hand and hurrying him through the entrance-way, stumbling over all sorts of dusty properties, bruising his shins, and disconcerting him generally.

"There, stand right there," she said at last, backing him up against a lot of dusty scenery, out of use, and piled up against a wall. "Don't move from that spot," she whispered, "until I call for you."

Josh stood still, panting hard, but hopeful again. Suddenly, with a lunge, he was driven nearly through the scenery against which he leaned.

It was a "flat" being shoved back by the scene-shifters setting the stage for the next act. The wooden edge of the flat frame struck him, and held him fast and crushed. He struggled to get free, but something was pushing the flat, and somebody was swearing vigorously because it would not go back far enough. Suddenly some one came running toward him to see what was obstructing. Discovering Josh, in danger of being cut in two apparently, his white hat crushed, and generally mussed, the scene-shifter yelled indignantly:

"What in the devil are you doing here?"

"Nothing," answered Josh, meekly.

This was so plainly the case that the man could only laugh, and showing the flat forward a little, released him, with the advice to "clear out of that p. d. q."

Josh, without any idea where to clear to, looked helplessly around, when, happily, the elder Potter came up. Josh felt rather queer, and did not understand at all when Mrs. Potter, carefully laying both her bare arms on his shoulders, said earnestly: "Oh! I'm so sorry you got hurt."

Alas! the bountiful make-up on the fat Potter's arms left two long white, unmistakable arm marks on Josh's shoulders.

"Now, in a minute, she will see you in a nice, quiet place behind the scenes," she added, viewing with satisfaction the effect of the arm-marks. Then she piloted Josh around a lot more scenery, until they stood in some half-dark wings.

The curtain was up, and the act was going on, when suddenly Josh's heart gave a great jump, for in the other end of what appeared to be an alley-way—it was really the space between two sets of flats run on the stage—appeared the majestic Borrilli. She hesitated a moment, advanced half way, and—heavens, could he believe his eyes!—stretched out her arms appealingly, exactly as he had admired her in the second act every night. Josh was for running toward her, but the Potter pulled him back, and as she did so, purposely smeared the breast of his coat with white.

"Not yet," whispered Mrs. Potter. "When I tell you, rush to her, kneel, and make hot love. She will pretend to repulse you, but never mind; don't leave her. There; now go!"

Josh rushed to his adored, and knelt at her feet. His brain was on fire.

"For heaven's sake, sir, leave me!" cried the amazed and terrified Rinda, still holding her arms out appealingly, however.

"Never! my dearest angel!"

The audience got the benefit of the last two words, for as Josh spoke them the flat hiding him from the audience was run back, as it was every night. Luckless Josh!

There was a wild shout and yell from the house. The stage-manager, knowing that something was frightfully wrong, looked up the stage from where he stood in the first entrance, and saw, what the whole house saw and was in hysterics over: Josh on his knees, with uplifted hands, before the Fairy Queen; his hat crushed, his clothes dusty and awry, his shoulders marked by two long, white, unmistakable streaks, his eyes bulging in a perfect agony of dismay, the Fairy Queen petrified with outstretched, appealing arms.

That stage-manager was a man of quick wit and determination. He gave one glance at the spot on which Josh knelt; he pulled a signal cord, a bell rang under the stage, a trap was sprung, and Josh shot through the stage into the arms of a shirt-sleeved mechanic.

The mechanic viewed Josh for some seconds in dumfounded amazement, and then exclaimed:

"What in the devil are you doing here?"

That was the second time Josh had been asked that same question within ten minutes, but familiarity with it did not seem to clear his mind on the proposition.

There was nothing, absolutely nothing, in the situation Josh could account for. He knew he had in some strange way been in a horrid flood of blinding light, in full view of thousands of people who were roaring at him on his knees before the Fairy Queen. Then had come a dreadful shock, and he found himself in a dimly lighted hole filled with wheels, and ropes, and shirt-sleeved men, smoking pipes and staring at him very hard. Josh was not altogether certain that he was not in hell.

Josh is again a swell—rather an old bachelor swell—of Petaluma; to which place he returned the very morning after the night of his experience in the California Theatre, and he has never left the county since. There are younger and gayer beaux in Petaluma than Josh, but none that can approach his reputation as a swell—a reputation enhanced, sustained, and, in its present aspect, based almost, on certain mysterious rumors regarding a very delicate affair in which he figured in a manner much to his credit.

Josh has always refused to go into the details of that affair, saying, with a solemn, meaning smile, that "there are personal experiences no gentlemen will relate, however much his mere vanity might be flattered by their being known."

And Rinda? The stage-manager's note, received the morning after the bouquet night, informing her that her services would be no longer needed, was her salvation.

She went back to Milpitas and married the energetic of a neighboring farmer. Her husband developed traits her father lacked, which he demonstrated by the Blodget farm of debt, and placing it on a par with Rinda's eldest child is called Blanche Borrilli Boggs.

Bot

On Account of a Friend.

By JAMES HARDY.

YES, the light is fine on the banks of flowers and the fresh pines behind them, and I'm glad you're able to be out to enjoy it, Mrs. Stetson, after being shut up weeks in a sick-room. This clear air and pure sunshine is the best medicine for a sick frame or a sore heart. That's what I came out for to the Park this afternoon. I'm too sad and vexed to endure the sight of men's faces—on account of a friend.

If you admire brave men, then there was one for you. When they were building the sea-wall at Alcatraz, one day, when the work was half finished, the workmen took it into their heads to strike. No particular reason, only they knew the time was short for filling the contract, and it was a good chance to demand more wages. Twelve o'clock Monday every man dropped his tools and refused to do a stroke more, or let others work. My friend, who was superintending the works, came down at one o'clock, and found five hundred men lounging, and every hour worth gold to the company. He made short argument; for a big fellow, the leader, with his red flannel sleeves rolled above his huge elbows, began to threaten him. "Ye big blackguard," says he, "for a sixpence I'd let the breath out of ye, and the b'ys'll stand by me." Lawrence didn't say any more. He was a slim, wiry fellow, and didn't look like much before the big black Patrick; and one man against five hundred Irishmen, hunting for the best pieces of stone to throw at him, isn't in a place to talk. He stepped to the office and came back with a box of giant-powder cartridges. Black Murphy was waiting for him in front of the mob. "Men," says Lawrence, facing the scowling, muttering, threatening crowd, longing to get at him and tear him to pieces, but not quite knowing how to begin, "I've got one word to say to you. I give you just three minutes to clear out of here and get back to your work. If you aren't gone at the end of that time, I'll let you have these." He stood about twenty feet from them, steady and cool, his cigar between his lips, and in each hand a grenade with the fuse cut short. He had only to light them with his cigar, and throw them into the crowd to blow it to atoms. The men stood their ground, looking at him for a minute and a quarter by the big clock on the outside of the office, when Black Murphy said: "Byes, I don't like the look of 'em things nor the eyes o' that devil. There's no good stayin' to see what comes of it." He moved away and the rest followed, melting off the slope, and by the time the three minutes were up the last man had his tools in his hand at work in his place. They might have torn him to pieces instead, but somehow they didn't think of it.

Stern? He didn't look it. A quiet, slender, dark man, with thoughtful, inexpressive face, that didn't let out its secrets much; serious dark eyes, that took in everything without looking, and that I've seen all wishfulness and sensibility, like a woman's. I don't think anybody ever saw them look so but myself, unless it might be a woman. I'm certain no man ever did. For one thing, he never had to ask many favors. He came from back East when he was hardly out of his teens, and before he was twenty-three he had made over a hundred thousand dollars. By the time he was twenty-seven he had made and lost three fortunes. The last time every cent was swept away except a few thousands belonging to his sisters, which he managed to protect. I remember things well; for the firm I was with went by the same gale, and couldn't pay even my salary just due. About five o'clock that afternoon we heard that Lawrence had gone to complete smash. It was early in November, a sullen, threatening day, and, going up California Street in the dark, I saw Lawrence ahead of me, walking—well, as a man walks when things aren't good with him. I caught up, and fell into his style, and kept up with him. We went past Polk Street and Van Ness Avenue out near Lone Mountain, the dreary fine rain sifting in our faces, a harsh wind coming from the ocean, neither speaking, but keeping that swift pace out toward the sand-hills. We got out by the Cliff House, when he turned in a dogged way, I following, back for the city. When we got by the cemetery, the clouds thinning and weak moonshine coming out, he stopped short, and turned to me, with a laugh:

"Bowen, how long are you going to stick to me this way?"

"To Oakland Wharf, and as far as I can swim after that," I said, meaning it, for I was as reckless as he.

"I won't lead you off the dock to-night; for I'm going to give those fellows another chance to ruin me." Then he set off at a racing pace, till we got on the brow of the hill, above Kearny Street, when I saw him reel. He had eaten nothing since noon of the day before, and the reaction began to tell. I suggested he should get some supper.

"I can't go down to my hotel, or anywhere else they know me. I can't bear the fellows looking at me to-night. Let's go in here," turning to a little coffee-saloon on a sidestreet. "By George! I haven't any money," feeling in his pocket. "No; I paid the last quarter out to the office-boy this afternoon; he came asking for something, as his mother had been bent to pay to-night, and he always helped her. Well, this is a curious sensation. Pretty quick work cleaning a fellow out."

I was as badly off as he till I could get money from home. "Confound it, but I'm savagely hungry when I can get nothing to eat without virtually begging it. Last week I couldn't eat at the Perham's dinner for want of appetite, and now I could eat boarding-house hash or a loaf of bread whole. They feed prisoners going to be hanged for murder; I should think they'd feed a man guilty of losing three hundred and eighty thousand dollars like a fool, as I've done. Young go and cram while you have the chance, while I hunt for a trunk-strap to lessen the pangs of hunger. You can have your watch first, and then begin on your best coat."

"Yes! I had pawned my watch—only a clerk's silver one—send a dispatch home, having prudently lent all my savings to my employer's son the week before, only keeping enough to last me till pay-day. When he heard the statement of my resources, Lawrence drew out his black silk guard, and let me see his watch was gone, too. I found afterward that he had sold it to send some money promised before the crash came to a needy widowed cousin. A trifle hung to the ring—a dwarf pencil-case, in ebony and gold, that I had often seen there. It was the price of a meal, and I was fool enough to say so.

"Not that, Bowen," he said, with a curious softness in his voice, putting up his hand as if to caress the trifle. "The girl who gave that pencil and chain to me before I left home scrimped the trimming on her dress to pay for it, and I've worn it every day since. She cared for me, and I—forgot her, I suppose, in the rush out here, but her gift shan't be sold for a dinner—bless her! Thank heaven, she isn't hanging round my neck now, with all that's happened—for her own sake, I mean. Yet I'd give the last thing I had to lose to see her face, and hear her speak to me to-night."

There we were, two wretches, starving hungry, sitting on the steps of St. Mary's Church, turning our pockets inside out to find the price of supper at a cheap restaurant, and all the thoughts of home tugging at our hearts. Luckily I had a hole in my vest pocket, and a quarter had slipped down into the lining. I don't think money was ever as good to either of us before or since. I bought some rolls, and we munched them in the open air, feeling as much like vagabonds as we were, I suppose.

I don't think Lawrence ever forgot sharing those crusts with me, and when he fell into some sort of business, he insisted on my going in with him, and taking care of me till I got on my own feet again.

A year from that time he had ten thousand dollars, and a growing business—small things to what his ambition had been; but he was content to wait his time before trying to strike out again. And he might have been successful, and I might have had my friend still, if it hadn't been for a woman.

Lawrence had just come up from Guaymas, and stayed over at Santa Barbara for the next steamer. But he hadn't been home a day when I saw the change was on him, for he was absorbed, moody, civil, giving the shortest answers, and with the sociability of an obelisk. Theatre? No, thank you. Drive to the Cliff House? Hardly in the mood today. Make some calls on our avenue friends? Not up to it this evening. Things I, I hope Lawrence isn't going into speculations again. One night I dragged him down to the hotel, to some reception we ought to attend, and Senator Chester's party were guests of the evening. You know the daughter, Florence, who came out two years ago from France? She had been sent to school with princesses abroad, and was as fine a brown-haired blonde as they make 'em. The way she came into the parlors that night made us all hold our breaths at her. I can see her coming down the wide room, between the pillars wreathed with smilax and huge ferns; her father, fearfully proud of her, following like the shadow to her beauty. Dressed to a marvel—in pale pink silk, with drifting Flemish laces half a yard deep, a little black velvet in her dress to relieve her exquisite complexion, satiny, warm, rose-white—supple figure, Greek face, lustrous brown hair, and large, maddening brown eyes, a girl to dazzle, infatuate, and mislead. Think of this creature—fresh as dawn, her white, girlish shoulders peeping out of the tulle, her eyes blazing to match her other jewels, the damask tinge in her round cheeks, her pink topazes like linked dew-drops swinging in fine gold threads at her ears, and soft throat that I defy a man to see and not want to kiss. She looked like something to be kept in satin, with the rest of the family jewels, all her life, and for a poor man to set his heart on her was sheer madness. I tell you, I've bated to see a girl's bouquet of pink rosebuds and stephanotis, such as she carried, since that night.

As she floated in, the people hushed a moment to admire her brilliance. I caught sight of Lawrence's face. Not a single line of his features had changed, that you could swear, but there was a light behind them as if his soul had struck fire, and his eyes blazed as they fell upon her. [Do you feel the chill strike you, Mrs. Stetson? I thought you shivered, though it seems so warm and sheltered here. Let me draw your fur around you. If you can listen to my ramblings, I would like to tell you all, and never speak of it again.]

When Lawrence came up-stairs that night to our rooms, it was to say that he had decided to take some heavy Mexican contracts then offering, as old Slade had promised to back him if he ever felt like taking up a big thing again. I had to say that, for modest traders, the idea of handling eight-million-dollar contracts was not a good one to put a man to sleep. But he had his answer ready:

"There are nine hundred thousand profit to be made out of the business and what it leads to, and such operations will put us back among a higher class of people, where we belong. For a year or two, Bowen, I believe I've been losing my ambition, but I've not lost my grip yet."

"Damn pink topazes and the women who wear 'em!" I muttered under my breath. I never had sung out slow before, but it was a big risk for a young firm, and when it was nothing but a pink-and-white woman it was done for, a man had reason to swear. But then Lawrence had made me, as you might say, and I was bound to follow him in the deepest sea he ever swam in. Besides, what was the use of saying anything to a man for whom the sun rose and set over that one woman's head?

It went well with Lawrence's winning and wooing that winter. A man of his prestige isn't lost from society without regret, and when he began to show himself at people's houses again they were glad enough to credit him with a new turn of his wonderful luck. He pleased the Chesters, for he made their house celebrated that season by his taste and his gifts, which were devoted to the homage of his beautiful mistress. His unerring taste and quick invention planned the Christmas masque, the carnival tableaux, and the choice dinner-parties of twelve, which did so much for Chester's soaring ambition that winter. It was Lawrence's skill which carried off the British earl as prize from a score of jeweled hands held out supplicatingly; and what is more, so amused, aroused, and possessed that noble Briton that he was in the habit of regretting "that California fellow, you know," for seasons after. Lawrence's lover-like fancies in bric-à-brac made "Miss Chester's unequalled taste" quoted in art-shops and æsthetic coteries. Why, that girl was remarked everywhere that season for the superb taste of her bouquets, which were Lawrence's delight to choose for her. He bribed her maid to let him know what dresses her mistress was to wear on occasions, and just before her toilet came flowers so admirably chosen that they were enough to give the wearer a style of themselves. For her pink pale tulles came vivid red rosebuds, glowing through their mossy sheaths, sent from Los Angeles gardens; or if she wore faint Japanese blue, there were blush-roses half blown, with white papyrus, or bouvardias in matchless tinges and flushes of rose penciled with carmine, set in sprays of silver-ivy, or maidenly knots of white abutilons and hair-ferns, or delicious waxen tea-blossoms tied up with their own glossy leaves in exquisite carelessness. You would see her with bouquets of large, black, velvety rosebuds and creamy-pink heath, or a bertha of black pansies to set off her fairness as only pansies can—always flowers with a grace and expression, whether they were costly orchids and adiantum, or a nosegay of bluebells in melting sky, pink and garnet tinges, Frenchiest of common flowers. Lawrence chose the bindings for his lady's favorite books, Burgundy velvet with gem-like ivory miniatures let into the sides; white vellum with gold filigree corners, and the stamped leather in renaissance work copied from king's breviaries, whose intricacy almost led one to go no farther than the cover. His taste ordered the carvings, illuminations, and plaques which made her sitting-room like a princess's cabinet, with its painted lattices, carved bookshelves, Indian porcelains, enamels, and faded rich embroideries. It pleased Lawrence to be every evening busy with pencils and colors in the study, with Miss Chester and her mamma, smiling and complimenting graciously the quick skill which was to make their house and belongings quoted for inapproachable taste by all their fashionable set. This artistic pleasure brought him near the girl he adored, gave him familiarly a place in the household, where he was appealed to, courted, and all but caressed. You know you may stand close to an artist while he sketches the design for your screen in tambour-work, your hand on the high back of his chair, the perfume of your dress affecting him, your warm white slender hand and wrist before his eyes pointing out corrections you wish made, your supple form and silken flounces forever in his way in the easy companionship bred of the atelier. There must be impromptu lunches with my lady and Florence alone after a morning spent in choosing new decorations or placing the new bric-à-brac just arrived by the steamer; there must be consultations over the addition to the conservatory, over the music-room to be made out of the old wing, over the presents to be sent to the last new bride of their acquaintance, or the subscription lists of the new charity, and I'm not sure that Mrs. Chester didn't confide to him her dissatisfaction with her second girl and the French maid. It was very convenient on one side, very encouraging on the other, and if it lulled Lawrence's uncertainty till he could point to his success and speak as an intensely proud man would wish to—why, you women understand these things. I say, that winter, before the Chesters went to New York, things were just as well understood in the family as if Chester had placed his daughter's hand in Lawrence's with his dignified and worthless blessing, and the initials were already marked on the wedding silver. It was, "Here, Lawrence, I've got the directors coming here this evening to go over those lists; can't you take these ladies to hear Janauscheck?" or "Can't you spare time to see my wife and Florence down to Paso Robles? Give you a good trip, and I really ought to be here to meet those gentlemen coming round by Panama;" or "Lawrence, Mrs. Chester particularly wished to go to the Palace to-night to call on a very old friend. It's imposing on your good nature, of course, but you seem so much one of ourselves you'll take my asking kindly," and so on. What won't an infatuated man do to keep within sight of the girl he cares for, and within sweep of her dress. What more and better did Lawrence ask than such favor to be her cavalier and servant till he could ask and claim everything. Miss Chester never compromised herself by any indiscretion, I swear—she was too discreetly trained not to be chary of her favors; no pressing of hand, or lips perhaps, behind a curtain, no entangling phrases in little notes. Only eyes can convey untellable things without damaging evidence afterward, and an exquisite tone of graciousness in an exquisite manner might mean everything to a man blindly, desperately in love.

So it was till that tall, exclusive young Ogden came out to do California in his spring tour. Ogden, with his collections and university manners, his reserve and old family hauteur, dating as much as sixty years back to the smart village pettifogger, his grandfather, who ducked and elbowed his way next to the Presidential chair, and almost as many from the peddler's pack, whence sprang his maternal fortune—Ogden, with his air of doing faultlessly whatever he did, and of saying with perfection the only thing to be said in the circumstances, with his English trousers and Viennese dressing-cases, his colored "man," his superb oblivion of objects not immediately affecting himself, his cold, gray eyes, and general first mortgage on the universe. You know his style: leaving a score of invitations from his mother's friends unanswered on the hotel tables, while he went off to Yosemite on the trail of an English lord; throwing over a lady's dinner party, given in his honor, for a yachting cruise, on which her son happened to be his next neighbor at the table, by the way; going down to choose a lot of Alaska curios for a friend, and buying the whole—silver-mounted pipes, wood and walrus carvings, and painted images—and packing them to New York the same day, without an idea that he had transgressed the sovereign rights which unlimited money and selfishness conferred upon him. This young patrician Miss Chester happened to please, and very much he himself pleased Mrs. Chester.

The feminine Chester was a wary old bird; no fishing for an introduction, no invitations to dinner from her. Only a meeting with her daughter, rosy and radiant as Hebe at a picture-gallery—Hebe in a Valenciennes bonnet, with hedge-roses, pale pink frock in Directoire simplicity, and a lace scarf which had been Mrs. Chester's most cherished and expensive finery. The jeune fille Américaine business was charmingly done, the vestal unconsciousness, the delicate connoisseurship, the watchful guardianship of the elder lady, the repose, the graceful floating round the room and retiring to the carriage—a young duchess couldn't have done it better. Then Chester père met the young aristocrat, flattered him by talking statesmanship, let him see how the helm of the political party was within reach of his own hand, allowed him glimpses of Miss Chester in exquisite surroundings before he was finally permitted to know her. In short, a clever, crafty old politician played a self-willed, concealed young one, till the millionaire determined to add Florence Chester to his unrivaled collection.

The odds were in his favor, the chances of a man of leisure against one in engrossing business, and the Chesters for the first time began to be considerate of Lawrence's time, which he had often illy spared; the chances of assured position and fortune against a man tried by reverses, the airs of a critic and virtuoso against a quick-blooded man, who was only an artist in skill and feeling; and, lastly, the advantage an utterly selfish, unscrupulous man holds against one who devotedly loves. There was just one thing which Ogden had not reckoned for, the preference of a self-willed, petted girl. She honestly liked the man whose breath came quicker as she bent beside him, whose eyes burned into hers the regard he would not trust his lips to utter, and whose exquisite devoirs pleased and complimented her trained tastes to the core. She played into her parents' hands admirably in the preference she showed to Lawrence, for nothing so effectively riveted Ogden's first fancy, till what was the tame choice of the prettiest girl he found became a contest of pride with a gifted, daring rival, as full of nerve, vehemence, and self-will as if he were Ogden of Ogdenville, with the world to pick from, instead of one as poor and clever as that young despot's grandfather. Ogden finally, in his supremely audacious way, taxed Miss Chester with Bohemian taste in choosing her intimates, when she should command the foremost and the best.

"By best I suppose you mean wealthiest," she answered, grandly. "I admire men who can make millions as well as spend them with a grace. I never choose any but successful friends, as you ought to know."

The devil stole a suggestion into Ogden's ear, which invited such confidences. It might be necessary to ruin this rival to get rid of him, and nothing so congenial could offer to a man who liked to feel his power over others' fate and fortunes. The girl before him was of his own make, he believed, after all. Show her the man she was proud of humiliated and discredited, and old Chester would have good reason to doubt she was his daughter if she did not whistle him off as coolly as they could wish.

He went to work in his direct, unsparing fashion. He found Chester père, intimated his intentions toward Florence, and signified his support of the ambitious views of his future father-in-law, provided the alliance proved agreeable. The two men talked over the preferences of the girl one of them had molded, with the few significant words and phrases of silence which convey the meaning of ill-made souls to each other. How it was Ogden became possessed of Lawrence's plans and liabilities perhaps Chester knew best. The spirit of Ogden's pettifogging ancestor woke in his heir; his New York broker knew Slade, who was backing Lawrence, and knew Slade's weakness for a good outside thing, and his hankering to get inside a certain ring where Ogden's money had the pass; the rest, to a cool schemer with unlimited money, was easy enough.

I need not bore you to tell how in less than a month from that time, by various financial moves, old Slade was brought to withdraw his backing; and while Lawrence was agast at this blow, a dozen sinister rumors crept about him. He was trading on supposed influence to gain the hand of a rich man's daughter, and making this alliance prop his business schemes; he had failed too many times to be worth trusting again; his contract, when finished, never would make money for the stockholders, and so on. Old Chester withdrew from his intimacy gradually and becomingly, which gave credit to these bad compliments. Mrs. Chester amiably "had nothing to say against the young man whom she had treated like one of her own family," and earnestly "hoped poor Lawrence would pull through; she was, too, thankful his errors were only of the head, and not the heart; she had never underrated that generous, ambitious nature," leaving her hearers with an impression that they had overrated Lawrence in supposing him more than an audacious noodle with luck at the start. Florence stood by him till his failure was in the newspapers, and an examination of his accounts ordered in a way which had a skillful flavor of suspected embezzlement; but, as she remarked afterward, "no woman could bear such a blow to the idol she had cherished till it was a part of her life," and accordingly Mrs. and Miss Chester went East to the wedding of some thirtieth cousin, in the same train which took up Ogden on his way from Salt Lake.

The only farewell to Lawrence was a very polite note from Mrs. Chester, with best wishes, and regretting that their address would change so constantly from Cooperstown to Saratoga and Seagirt, that they could not promise themselves the pleasure of hearing from friends until settled, later in the season. "Nothing that any one could take up," said that point-lace diplomate, "really nothing that any one had the least right to feel ill-treated over. There was no reason why the young man shouldn't come to the surface again after his reverses; he had such wonderful recuperative power, and really nothing seems to affect such men much"—which was an excellent reason for leaving him in deep water, and giving his head a bob under as it served them. Then Mrs. Chester must remember that Lawrence had an old photograph of Florence, from which he had made several album sketches; and, with the delicacy of her kind, sent the errand boy to Lawrence's office for it after she had left. "Were they afraid I should parade it as a lady's favor?" he said to me, bitterly. "Why didn't they send a policeman for it?"

It was hard for his friends to see him, in those days, going about the miserable wreck of things, the dreary business of settling up, with its lacerating saws and dagger-thrusts; hearing himself denounced as men speak of one who has committed the crime of ill-success; seeing another firm take hold where the affairs had broken off in his grasp, and reap the profit he had sown. He saved something for his friends, arranged for all dependent on him as far as he was able, and then disappeared.

The cards are out for Mrs. Evyan Ogden's receptions in New York this winter, and her new house, her matchless complexion, her perfect hands—which Graver has modeled for those of his memorial angels—her musical evenings, and her Dresden dinner service, are topics for the gossips. I have just been saying good-bye to Lawrence. Does it make you sad to hear this? You could have been kind to him if you had known him—some women have hearts left. You know the coal vessel that was wrecked outside the harbor the other night? There was one strange hand shipped to work his passage down the coast, and when the waves washed the grime off his face, and laid him out on the sands next morning, some one knew him for Lawrence Breton. The little black silk guard was around his neck, and the pencil knotted in it. We took it off for some one who might inquire for him. A little thing, isn't it? to be all that's left of one's friend.

You know that pencil? And you were Hester Adams, who gave it to him? And I've been telling this long story to you, another man's wife?

A MORAL TALE.

The Prince of the Province of Ya—

'Tis far in the land of Nod—

Had a wizard god-papa

Who owned an enchanted rod.

A wonderful rod, they said,

Golden, and set with pearls;

At its touch men fought and fled,

And it caught the shrewdest girls.

"I'll will you this," said god-papa

To the princely prince of the Province of Ya.

"'Tis good of you, I'm sure;

But the yeomen of Ya are leal:

And, really, I wish the girls were fewer—

I do, by my royal seal!"

"By Ya! he refuses my gift,"

The wizard frowned out in a huff:

But the young prince merely whiffed

The smoke from his royal ruff.

"He's a good old lad, but a fig for his rod,

And for all the girls in the land of Nod."

* * *

One day, half awake, half asleep,

In a hammock that fronted a lawn,

The young prince lay; a reverie deep

Had compassed his brain since dawn.

And the mystery was he couldn't tell what

The deuce was to pay in that royal spot

He had learned was his heart. It was not pain,

Nor yet was it joy; 'twas only plain

That something was up with his royal nibs.

Had his heart thumped hard 'gainst his royal ribs,

Or his brain whirled swift in his princely head,

"'Tis the Tagus wine," the prince would have said,

But that this something was plainly not.

Just then a housemaid, passing the spot

Laden with linen, stumbled and fell.

Linen, and lawn, and ankles—well,

The prince had an eye for a fine effect;

And, even had details less correct

Made of the picture more than half,

They'd not have smothered the royal laugh.

But the maid was angry, and quite forgot

Who 'twas she was answering, and what

She said to his highness. This 'twas she said:

"You're a mean old thing, and I wish you were dead."

* * *

"Ha! that is treason!" He called the guard,

And they led her into the castle hall.

"By my sooth, but it bites me hard

To man'cle a maid," said the captain tall.

But they led her in chains to the dais stair,

And bade her kneel at the foot of the throne.

"By my budding beard, but the maid is fair,"

Muttered the prince; but the prince's tone

Was cold as the steel of his rapier long

As he had her arise and stand less near.

"It likes me not—thy sex. Stand there!"

And he motioned her to the end of the hall,

Where, over against the farthest wall,

Stood the enchanted wasteful chair.

A golden bauble flashed in the light

That streamed through the window high o'erhead.

She was a woman, and, swift as the flight

Of a swallow, the tawny, golden red

Of the wizard's rod and her hand had met.

The proud prince paled. Could he forget

His black-browed god-papa's hot farewell?

Then he flushed deep. There's little to tell

Not told already. The prince was young,

And the maiden fair as a lover's dream.

So the genealogist, Fundelung,

Paddled his skiff along the stream

Of the housemaid's genealogy.

Till he found a poor apology

For a royal duke afloat somewhere.

And the prince's courtiers shouted: "There! I

We knew 'twas so from the first. Huzza!

For the duchess who weds the Prince of Ya!"

December, 1882.

RALPH S. SMITH.

THE LEGEND OF THE VILAS.

Adam and Eve—so teaches us the old legend—had thirty sons and thirty daughters. When the Lord questioned the father one day about his children, he, being ashamed of his numerous family, kept back three of his daughters, and mentioned only twenty-seven.

Whereupon the Lord was very angry, and took the three most beautiful of all these daughters, and raised them from the earth on which their father had denied them, and which they should never tread again, and gave them over to the atmosphere.

So fly the Vilas through the air, immortal, as long as mankind shall last, rejoicing in all the joys of humanity, and free from all the sorrows which oppress the human heart.

They flew with the air into the ark of Noah, mourning over the destruction of man, and made ready to give their assistance to the incoming race.

And when the great Redeemer appeared on the earth, through the sacrifice of his blood to ransom mankind, once more sunken in sin and shame, they hovered humbly around, adoring, praising, and glorifying the holy manger at Bethlehem. They followed the Son of God on his way, and while the cross of Golgotha loomed up above, kissed, weeping, the wounds of his feet and hands, from which his innocent blood flowed for the guilt of humanity.

And then they sped far away over the earth, everywhere blessing man and assisting him. But when they came to Serbia, where the great Czar reigned, they would roam no farther. Here would they stay and make their home; for they found that the land was like Paradise, out of which their parents had been driven, and through whose closed portals they looked back admiringly and longingly; they found that the people in this land were good, and true, and pious, as nowhere else on the earth.

But the Vilas were lonely, and envied man the love which glorified prosperity, and changed to joy misery in suffering. As their feet were not allowed to rest on the earth, they built themselves a palace in the clouds, supported by the top of the mountain. This palace had three doors. The first glistened like gold, the second shimmered as with pearls, and the third flamed with reddish purple. Out of the golden door they carried fortune, victory, and riches to man; out of the gate of pearl they flew down to bring to the unfortunate and suffering the blessed relief of tears; and before the purple portal they sat, and looked down on the play of the lightnings, which, in the thunder-clouds at their feet, quivered through each other. But they were lonely in their palace, and longed for the love which might glorify and warm their lives as they warmed and glorified the life of man.

And God took pity on their longing, and allowed that each should choose, according to her taste, a brave and pious hero from the Slavonian people.

So the Vilas flew down over the Slavon land, and each chose a beautiful, brave, and pious youth from this noble race. They appeared to their chosen ones floating on before them, as they wandered over the mountains on a lonely hunt; and the youths followed the beautiful, magical maidens, who always soared farther upward, and who led them at last to the magnificent cloud-palace, where they sank in their arms, and blessed them with unspeakable delight.

Their longings were satisfied, and in more perfect bliss they lived with the beings of their choice in the pure heights of the air, over the droves of the earth. And graceful daughters grew to them out of their alliances of love, modest and pure as they, like them bound to the atmosphere, powerful as they to defend mankind, and to revive him with strength in battle and consolation in suffering.

But they forgot man in their happiness; they forgot to watch over the Slavonian people; they went down no more to strengthen it in faith and piety.

There drew near the Turkish army. The mighty din of battle reached up to the cloud-palace, and awoke the Vilas from their dreams of love. Terrified, they flew down through the quivering lightnings, and saw bow the banner of the cross retreated, and how the wild hordes of blood-thirsty Turks drew nearer and nearer.

Then they armed their own loved heroes with glittering weapons, and sent them down to assist the oppressed. But God had turned away from them. These heroes fell in battle, and their valiant work with their weapons accomplished nothing more than to open to a small band of Serbian warriors a way of escape from the billowy Turkish troops, from which they fled in struggling flight to the Black Mountains, where they have dwelt for centuries, gaining a refuge of religious faith and loyalty in the midst of the Turkish Government, to which all the land around is subject, struggling for freedom, and waiting with patience for the wrath of God to turn, and for the day of deliverance of all Christians of the Slavonian race to dawn.

The Vilas hovered long, mourning over the blood-stained battle-field, and spread veils of clouds over the corpses of their loved ones, until their bones sunk to dust. But then they left the land, and followed the sorrowing fugitives to the land of the Black Mountains, where they built another cloud-palace on the peak of the Lowsben, where they dwell with all their daughters. This palace also had three doors, but the golden door and the purple remained closed.

Only now and then Riviola, the eldest, whose business it principally was to strengthen with victorious might the heroes in battle, opened cautiously the golden door, to see whether the glittering cross arose with the rising of the sun, by which glorious symbol it should one day be proclaimed that the wrath of God was appeased, and that hosts of brothers drew near to the rescue.

And when the day comes—when Riviola, the Vila of the Holy Cross, sees this wonderful symbol—then will all the doors of the cloud-palace fly wide open. Out of the golden door will the Vilas fly down to cover the weapons of the Slavonian heroes in flashes of fire, before which the dazzled enemy fall backward. Before the purple door will they gather up the lightnings, in order to dash them down on the chiefs of the unbelievers. And before the portals of pearl will bow itself the rainbow of victory and the reconciliation of God; whose ends rest, the one on the holy city of Constantinople, and the other on the Russian Czar, and whose arch includes the whole world.

—For the Argonaut from the German.

A Christmas Night in the City of Mexico.

By JOSÉ F. GODOY.

AFTER one of those pronunciamientos, unhappily too frequent formerly in the land of Montezuma, the City of Mexico in the year 185—passed into the possession of the conservadores, or clerical party. As is often the case on such occasions, most of the public officers were removed by the new administration—a thing that also sometimes occurs in this republic.

Don Juan Garcilaz, who under the liberales, or liberal party, had held a subordinate office in one of the many departments of the government, was asked to resign his position. This he did promptly. Though he never took a very active part in politics, and though his salary was very necessary to him for the support of his family, Don Juan, even if he had not been asked to send in his resignation, would never of his own accord have remained in office with the new administration. He considered that it had come into power through fraud and force; he thought that its principles were subversive of the public good, and he therefore could not submit to serve it in any capacity. Some of his friends, who were in favor with the new government, again and again asked him to submit to the new order of things—a more remunerative office than the one he formerly had was even offered to him—but he turned a deaf ear to his friends, and insisted on remaining aloof from public affairs. He did not enter the ranks of those who opposed armed resistance to the new government, for he was no soldier; besides, he always deplored the fratricidal contests that forever rent asunder his native land. He contented himself with staying in the city with his family, as his means did not allow him to leave, and cherished the hope that his party might be restored to power.

While waiting for such a happy event, Don Juan, who had heretofore depended on his salary to support his family, was fortunate enough to obtain employment as book-keeper in a large hardware establishment in the Calle de la Palma. Don Juan was of a cheerful disposition, efficient and trustworthy, and soon gained the confidence of his employers. Don Anastasio Perez, the head of the firm which he served, took a decided liking to him, and treated him more as a friend than an inferior.

But it was not only in business that Don Juan and Don Anastasio were united; socially they were also on intimate terms. Their two families visited each other frequently; the wife of Don Juan was wont to spend whole days at the house of Don Anastasio; the children of the two families went to the same school, and the días de fiesta, or public holidays, (of which in Mexico at that time there were a great number, and nearly as many as working days,) were spent together, sometimes at the house of Don Juan, sometimes at the house of his employer.

The family of Don Juan consisted of his wife, Doña Tomasa—a lady who, besides going to church and attending to the kitchen, thought there was nothing else in life but to spend all her time talking to this and to that friend—Concha, their daughter, and Juanito, their son. Concha Garcilaz was, at the time we are speaking of, about seventeen years of age, a brunette of the loveliest type, with hands and feet like a child's, eyes as black as jet, within whose depths a world of tenderness and affection lay. The fascination, the fire, and, at the same time, the timid looks of her eyes, drew on her admiration from all. Still, though possessing beauty, Concha was modest, unassuming, and kind. She knew that she was beautiful (for what fair woman does not know that?)—but she never abused the power her beauty gave her. Not that she disliked to win admiration, but she did not endeavor to play the coquette, have a train of admirers, or become what we would call a belle. Juanito, the pet of Doña Tomasa, and the youngest branch of the family tree, was about five years of age—a vivacious, mischievous, and romping child; one whose animal spirits neither discipline nor example could restrain—a boy as hoyish as boys ever are—but affectionate to excess. The mother and her two children looked upon Don Juan as the greatest and the best of men. As to his greatness undoubtedly they erred, as Don Juan's talents were but ordinary, and he possessed none of those qualities which make a man great; but if there are men on this earth who can be styled perfect, we must rank him among their number. A good citizen, a loving husband, a kind father, a true friend, a charitable man—all this Don Juan was. Is it then strange that his family, brimful of love toward him, considered him the best of men?

Don Anastasio Perez was happy in the possession of a wife, who, every year of their married life, had blessed their union with an heir. He had been married to Doña Paula five years, and he had five children. It would not interest the reader, perhaps, were we to describe the five little ones; enough to say that there were two boys and three girls, and that Lolita, the eldest girl, was the father's favorite, as well as of no less a personage than Juanito Garcilaz. The affection of Juanito toward Lolita was so marked that he never missed an opportunity to be by her side, and his mother had found no better way to put a stop to his mischief than to threaten not to allow him to see Lolita. No matter on what mischief Juanito was bent, no matter how amused he might be in any game, at the sight of Lolita he would leave everything to fly to her side. She, likewise, ever sought his company, and looked happiest when playing with him.

By his first wife Anastasio Perez had had a son, Manuel, who, now in his twenty-second year, had returned to the City of Mexico, after having completed his education in Europe, and traveled for two years on that continent. He had come back a man with habits and tastes entirely opposed to those of his family, taking no interest in the affairs of his own city, disliking his early associates and companions, and by despising what he considered the want of refinement and education of his family and their friends. From the day of his return he led an idle and dissolute life among young companions whom he considered congenial spirits, and who, like him, spent their time in carousal and idleness. His father several times asked him to take a position in the firm, or, if he disliked mercantile pursuits, to enter upon some professional career, but Manuel always said that while he was rich he did not see why he should work, and that manual, or even intellectual, labor was irksome to him. As Don Anastasio's first wife had left Manuel a fixed revenue, his father was not able to deprive him of the means to continue his mode of life.

Manuel was scarcely ever at his father's house; most of the time he dined out with his own friends, and often returned home so late in the night, or, rather, so early in the morning, that he rarely met any of the family visitors. Still, the visits of Doña Tomasa Garcilaz and her daughter to Don Anastasio's house were so frequent, that one day Manuel had to meet them there.

From the first moment he set eyes on Concha, her beauty and modesty caused a deep impression on him. From that moment he loved her, or, rather, he desired to possess her. He was too cynical, too vicious, to have experienced a true and holy passion for her; he fancied her as a spoiled child likes a toy, to break it after it gets tiresome.

He became very attentive to her, and employed all his arts of fascination to charm her. As he was the son of her father's employer, she received his attentions graciously, though she could not disguise a certain dislike toward him that she was unable to overcome. His bad reputation had already been discussed by her father and mother, and she knew that his conduct toward his family was not commendable. But even had his character been other than it was, even had his handsome figure and honeyed words possibly have pleased her, he never could have won her love—that was plighted already.

Luis Moncada, a brilliant and talented young journalist, who, before the occupation of the City of Mexico by the clericals, had been editor of one of the pronounced liberal newspapers of the capital, had succeeded ere this in being beloved by her. When the conservadores came into power he had left the city, and, laying aside the pen, had taken up the sword and joined the ranks of the liberal army. Since his departure, Concha had now and then heard indirectly from him. She knew he had distinguished himself in many a battle, and had risen to the rank of colonel. Afterward, through the newspapers, she learned that he was at the head of one of the guerrillas that hovered around the City of Mexico. All this time, however, she never received any letters from him; he never wrote, knowing that his letters would be intercepted by the enemy.

Before leaving he had, with the consent of Concha's parents, become betrothed to her, but the marriage had been postponed until the time arrived for the triumph of the liberals. It was, therefore, with anxiety that Concha looked for that happy period. Her love for Luis had but increased by his absence; his long silence did not disturb her. She trusted implicitly in his love, and felt convinced that he still was true to her, and would ever remain so.

In vain did Manuel glibly pour compliments in Concha's ears; in vain did he remain in his house when the Garcilaz family called, and become as attentive as he could to them; in vain did he invite them to places of amusement. His advances were but coldly received by Concha, and seemed displeasing to her father. It is true that he made the conquest of Doña Tomasa, who now said she knew the reports about Manuel's wild ways were incorrect, and always in private stood up in his defense when her husband blamed Manuel's conduct. Not a word of love had ever passed Manuel's lips when addressing Concha; however expressive his eyes might be, his lips were always sealed.

One day that Doña Tomasa and Concha were at the house of Señor Perez, and while they, Doña Paula, and Manuel were together in the parlor, the subject of the civil war then raging was broached.

"The news is very favorable for the government," Manuel said. "Yesterday a band of guerrillas was routed a few leagues from the capital."

"That is indeed pleasant news—for your government," said Doña Tomasa.

"And true, besides—no mere newspaper talk—but reliable news. The government forces attacked and destroyed the guerrilla of Luis Moncada."

"Of Luis Moncada?" Concha asked, growing suddenly pale at the mention of that name.

"Yes, and I am assured that the leader of the band was killed," answered Manuel.

"Killed!" cried Concha with a shriek, and falling on her knees. Her beautiful eyes looked up to heaven, then closed, and she fell back senseless in her mother's arms.

"Did you not know that Luis Moncada was her betrothed?" reproachfully said Doña Paula to Manuel, and then assisted Doña Tomasa in restoring Concha to consciousness.

Manuel was ignorant of the fact that Luis Moncada was his rival, but now that he knew it he secretly rejoiced at the thought that that rival would no longer stand in his way.

Concha was just reviving when her father, who happened to be in the house, entered the room.

"Has anything happened to Concha?" he asked, his voice trembling with emotion.

"Oh, merely a fainting spell," replied Doña Paula, not wishing to renew Concha's grief by mentioning what had taken place.

"She heard of poor Luis Moncada's death," said his wife to him in low tones.

"Luis is not dead," said Don Juan, aloud, so that his daughter might hear him. "The news of the defeat of his troops has been confirmed, but he was not killed nor taken prisoner."

Joy and happiness were depicted in Concha's grand eyes as she heard her father utter these words. Manuel could not fail to perceive that it was love for Luis that filled her soul, and that his suit would be nearly hopeless while that love existed.

"I am deeply grieved that my words should have caused you the pain they did. Believe me, señorita, I did not know of your engagement with Luis Moncada," he said to Concha, in an apologetic manner.

"I thought as much, and so I forgive you the pain that unintentionally you inflicted on me," said Concha, in a rather cold manner.

From that day Concha's dislike of Manuel Perez became stronger than ever. She avoided his conversation on all occasions, and repelled all the advances he made to her; while with him, what at first had been a whim, a fancy, now became an absorbing passion. All his thoughts were centered in her; even his companions and his dissipated mode of life could not tear her image from his heart.

A month passed away, and Christmas week came. It had been arranged between Don Juan and Don Anastasio that their two families should spend the Noche Buena (Christmas night) at the house of the former.

On Christmas eve the city always presents a gay appearance. The Plaza Mayor, or public square, opposite the cathedral, is filled with booths of all descriptions. All kinds of sweetmeats and toys are exhibited for sale, and all classes of entertainments—more especially titeres, or marionettes—are seen everywhere, for the delight of the children. The plaza swarms with people, buying and selling, seeing the sights, and promenading. At night the scene becomes even more attractive, owing to the lights of the booths and the increased attendance of people. In the Mexican homes, instead of our Christmas tree, it is the custom to have a nacimiento, or representation of the birth of our Saviour.

Let us enter the house of Don Juan, where there was to be one of these nacimientos. At eight o'clock the Garcilaz and Perez families, and many of their mutual acquaintances, were assembled in the parlor. When the word was given that the nacimiento was ready, all the children, who till then had been showing their impatience in various ways, burst out in loud cries of joy. Don Juan then ushered all into the room where the nacimiento was placed. What they saw there was beautiful enough to warrant the clapping of hands and other demonstrations of delight by the children.

A temporary stage had been constructed in the back of the room, and upon it diminutive hills and valleys were faithfully represented, and upon them toy butts might be seen, while Lilliputian shepherds were tending their flocks. In the centre, in one of the huts, the birth of our Saviour was represented, by means of a miniature stable, containing figures of wax delicately worked. The shepherds, the three kings from the east, St. Joseph and the Virgin—in fact, all the personages that we often see in paintings as having been connected with the events of that solemn occasion—were portrayed there.

The whole tableau—if one might so call it—was illuminated by hundreds of candles of different colors. The effect of it was wonderfully charming. After the nacimiento had been duly admired and commented upon, the children were left to eat sweetmeats, romp, and amuse themselves, while their elders went back to the parlor to dance and make merry. Juanito and Lolita remained by themselves in one corner of the room, aloof from the other children, eating some bonbons that Juanito had presented to his little friend.

Scarcely had the first dance begun than Don Juan was called by a servant, who said a gentleman wished to speak to him.

"His name?" asked Don Juan.

"The gentleman hasn't any, I don't think," answered the servant—a rather stupid one; "for he wouldn't tell it to me."

"Very well; take him to the dining-room, and I will see him presently," said Don Juan.

Shortly afterward Don Juan entered the dining-room, and saw a person who, wrapped up in a heavy cloak, was standing near the door.

"Please close the door, Don Juan," said the stranger, in a tone of voice that seemed familiar to Don Juan.

When the door was closed, the stranger quickly took off his cloak.

"You here, Luis?" exclaimed Don Juan, amazed at seeing in his house Luis Moncada, for whose head a price had been offered by the government of the conservadores.

"Yes, Don Juan, it is I," said Luis. "I am here on a secret mission from the Liberal Government, but could not leave the city again without seeing Concha once more."

"But you are mad, Luis. Do you not know that you are risking your life by remaining in the city any longer?" said Don Juan, in hurried words.

"I know it," replied Luis; "but what care I for that so long as I am to see Concha?"

"But at least you might have chosen some other time to make your visit, when it would be less dangerous," exclaimed Don Juan.

"The danger for me is less on a night like this. Everybody is in the streets, and the police are not on the alert for political offenders. Besides, how could they imagine that I would be in a house where so many people are coming and going, as is the case here to-night. No, I am safe. But let me see Concha but for five minutes, Don Juan; let me hear her say once more, 'Luis, I love you,' Moncada said, in a passionate manner.

"You shall see her presently; but let your stay be short. Every minute you stay in this house may imperil your life," exclaimed Don Juan, and then hastily left Luis to notify Concha.

She was sitting on a sofa, her eyes cast down, and scarcely paying attention to the many compliments showered on her by two or three young gentlemen sitting next to her. A few words were hurriedly whispered in her ear by her father; and her eyes brightened, her cheeks glowed, and, rising quickly, she excused herself to her admirers, and left the parlor.

Luis was anxiously awaiting her coming. Upon seeing him, she flew to his arms as a dove would fly to her mate.

"Ah! at last I see you, dear Luis," she exclaimed.

"Yes; but for a few moments. Ah! cruel fate that it were not a century," he said.

"But why must you leave me so soon?"

"There is great danger for me if I remain. But when I look in your eyes, it seems to me that death itself could not tear me from your presence," he said, passionately.

"Danger, you said; then leave me. Sweet as your presence is to me, the thought that you might be in danger for my sake terrifies me."

"But can I leave you, dear Concha, without hearing your sweet lips uttering words of love?" he reproachfully exclaimed.

"Love! What more would you have me say, than I have told you a thousand times, that I love you as my life—my existence," she said, and her eyes glowed with love.

Concha had scarcely uttered these last words, when her father came back with anxiety and fear depicted in his countenance.

"Quick, Luis, leave the house! The police are at our door," were the first words that Don Juan uttered.

"The police!" said Concha, turning deadly pale.

"Yes; and your only means of escape is the azotea. The roof of our house communicates with those of the other houses in our block. There is not a moment to be lost," said Don Juan.

Just then the noise of soldiers entering the patio, or courtyard, of the house could be distinctly heard.

Hurriedly snatching a farewell kiss from Concha, Luis directed his steps to the staircase that led to the azotea, or roof of the house; whilst Concha and her father, trying to conceal the agitation that had possession of them, returned to the parlor.

Soon the chief of police presented himself before the astonished household.

"Is Don Juan Garcilaz among you," he said.

"That is my name," exclaimed Don Juan, stepping forward.

"Then I summon you to deliver up the bandit, Luis Moncada," slowly and deliberately said the officer.

"Luis Moncada is not in my house," said Don Juan, as slowly and deliberately. "Luis must have escaped already," he thought to himself.

"We shall see whether he is not in this house," the chief of police replied; and, stepping to the door, he addressed a sergeant that was awaiting his orders, and said to him: "Sergeant Martinez, let your soldiers search the house from top to bottom; and don't forget the azotea."

Concha and her father could scarcely restrain a slight tremor on hearing these words.

The sergeant was about to execute the order given him, when Luis Moncada entered the room, saying:

"It is useless. I am your prisoner."

"Ah! So the bird is caged already," exclaimed the chief of police. "So you thought to escape by the azotea. Too many have played me that trick already. That is why I had some of my men enter by the neighboring houses, and remain on the roof until the blow was struck. And now follow me. You'll not have to wait long for your execution."

On hearing these terrible words, Concha remained as if petrified, while Luis grasped her hands, and in low tones uttered the words: "Courage, dearest; courage."

"And as to you, Don Juan," continued the chief of police, "you must also follow me as a prisoner. You have been guilty of harboring a prisionado."

Concha heard no more, but she rushed to her father, and, embracing him, wildly exclaimed:

"They shall not take you away—never, never!" and fell into a swoon in the arms of Don Anastasio.

"No more nonsense, but take these two prisoners away," said the chief of police, in harsh tones.

Not even giving time to Don Juan to bid adieu to his family, he and Moncada were dragged away between two files of soldiers.

"I wish I was bigger, for I would kill you," said little Juanito, threatening with his little fists the chief of police as the latter was going away.

The Christmas festivities terminated sadly indeed for Concha and her mother, and Don Anastasio and his family joined in the grief of their friends. Only one person who had witnessed the above scene, though manifesting deep concern at what had occurred, now and then smiled to himself with inward satisfaction. That person was Manuel Perez.

* * * * *

That very night the City of Mexico was attacked by the liberales, who took it by storm, and entered in triumph on the succeeding morning. Their first measure was to liberate all their partisans, who were languishing in the Acordada and other prisons.

Among these was Don Juan Garcilaz, who joyfully returned to the bosom of his family. Luis Moncada also was restored to the arms of his lovely Concha.

It is needless to say that a few nights afterward a marriage ceremony took place at the house of Don Juan Garcilaz; that the contracting parties were Luis and Concha; that Don Anastasio and his family were present on that occasion; that Juanito and Lolita danced together to their heart's content; and that all seemed joyful and happy. It was remarked that Manuel Perez was not present, but his absence was easily explained, as he had on that very morning left for an extended tour in Europe.

ERATO.

A Passion Plaint.

Up from the level setting of the sun
My footsteps pass, and then I kiss her hand,
And see her by the unblown lilies stand,
And carry off the prize that I have won;
And, lo! she knows not that the deed is done,
Nor that amid sky altitudes, so grand
They make the stars into vast spheres expand,
This part of her doth with my swift race run.
And once again I come and touch her hair,
Tossing the red-gold masses on her face,
And even now she has no thought of me;
Yet where rent sails stream out along the air
Men hear my trumpet sound through distant space,
And hail me as the great wind of the sea.

December 1882.

THOMAS S. COLLIER.

Vivien.

About her lissome limbs the samite clings,
And in her hair I see the snake of gold;
I meet her glances sweet, and soft, and bold,
And in mine ear her low love-song she sings;
And at my feet her trustless trust she flings.
I know her well; 'tis she who fold on fold,
In days long gone, round Merlin, wise and old,
Wrapped all her subtle charms, sweet threatenings,
And tears, and smiles. Dead! Vivien dead? Why,
You and I, and all men, for her sake
Daily forget ourselves, and every day
Do hear the cry, O Fool! She will not die
While there is still in man a heart to ache,
A brain to turn, a soul to lead astray.

December, 1882.

CARLOTTA PERRY.

Sestina.

Back, salt and bitter fountain of my tears,
Thou Marah in the desert of my heart!
Hast thou slept sealed and bound these many years,
Now into passionate flood-tide to start?
Now, when the hour of restfulness appears?
Now, when fair love has hid all care depart?

Once into exile me Fate hade depart;
Unblest I fared, incapable of tears;
Still, in sleep, broken by convulsive start,
I live again in dreams those weary years,
Though from those bitter days that racked my heart
No shadow now upon my calm appears.

To-day the current of my life appears
Smooth as a summer-wasted brook. Depart,
Full lightly, down Time's sunny slope the years.
Yet—yet—for slightest cause my wayward heart
Burns and brims over with these torturing tears—
The lax chords into strange vibration start.

I urge my mind's swift couriers to the start;
Perversely, bitterly beloved, appears
Ambition's thong, cutting the wretched heart.
The race begins, the blinding mist of tears
Would dim the goal. The chariot wheels depart.
Hail to the Future! Farewell, vanished years!

But stronger than oblivion stand the years
On whose gold background, at a word, will start
The stately face where that strong love appears
Which kept me like a fortress. I depart
Down Life's wild road—but, deeper than all tears,
That love throbs, living, in my stormy heart.

And but for that I would have slain thee, heart!
No helper thou to these my working years.
The grasp, the poise, the force of thought depart
When thine inexorable claim appears.
An iron nerve shall yet control thy start,
And a sealed stone the fountain of my tears.

Sad source of tears, the weakness of my heart,
At this new start, where all so vague appears,
With the lost years I bid thee hence depart!

December, 1882.

PHILIP SHIRLEY.

Opal.

My love is like a lute, whose silver strings
Are stirred by every breeze that flutters by;
My love is like the stars up in the sky,
Which clouds do now and then hide in eclipse;
My love is like the mists upon the hill,
Golden and azure, crimson-dyed and wan;
My love is like the changing emerald sea,
A gem, a flower, a sigh—all things that be.

Sometimes I say, she is so calm and pure
I dare not touch her even with my thought;
She is so saintly-fair that love's sweet lure Must smirch her. Then a sudden change
Doth cross her nature, and she blossoms swift
To tenderness—most like a rosy dawn
Brimmed full of song, and light, and the soft thrill
Of breathing leaves and amorous-threaded winds,
And shy, swift flutter of awakened wings.
And then, a pensive mood creeps to her lips,
Pallid, and gray, and weird, and sad, and strange;
That, in a breath, is shot with flame and fire;
Her eyes grow heavy with her heart's desire,
Her cheeks and mouth are vivid with deep hues
Stolen from some red sunset wet with dews.
She is a human poppy, subtle, warm,
Drowsy with dreams, yet filled with passionate life
And riotous with all love's rue-sweet strife.

December, 1882.

FANNY DRISCOLL.

LEGEND AND SUPERSTITION.

Although legend and superstition have left only a trace of their existence in this age of knowledge and progress, yet it is amusing and instructive to recall the fanciful and pretty myths that the minds of all classes scarcely questioned. They say it was from the weeping willow that the rods were made with which the Saviour was scourged, and from that time it has drooped its branches with shame. Washington Irving relates, in his life of the prophet, that at the age of three years, while Mohammed was playing in the fields with his foster-brother, two angels in shining apparel appeared before them. Gabriel, one of the angels, laid Mohammed gently upon the ground and opened his breast, but without inflicting any pain. Then taking forth his heart he cleansed it from all impurity, wringing from it those black and bitter drops of sin inherited from our forefather Adam, and which lurk in the hearts of the best of his descendants, inciting them to crime. When he had thoroughly purified it, he filled it with faith, knowledge, and prophetic light, and placed it in the bosom of the child. Nearly all the precious stones have superstitions connected with them. Famous diamonds have influenced the fortunes of nations and families. The emerald is said to have healing properties. It was a stone of ill-omen to Cortez, since the gift of a magnificent emerald to his bride so roused the envy of the Spanish queen as to withdraw from him her favor. The ruby was considered an amulet against poison, plague, evil thoughts and spirits. The sapphire is the favorite stone of Scripture. The tables on which the ten commandments were engraved are said to have been made of it. The carbuncle was supposed to have dropped from the clouds during flashes of lightning, and the changes in the opal were attributed to a supernatural agency. The turquoise is said to grow pale in sickness and sorrow, and the amber is the petrified tears of the sisters of Phaëton, the unlucky sun-charioteer. Grecian poets say that the rose was originally white, but was changed to red by the blood of Venus, who lacerated her feet with its thorns when rushing to the aid of Adonis. The fragrance of the rose is said to be derived from a cup of nectar thrown over it by Cupid, and its thorns to be the stings of bees, with which his bow was strung. The Druids blessed apples and distributed them among the people as a safeguard against evil. It was an ancient belief that the spirit of the far-famed upas tree had committed some great crime, and, in the way of penalty, it is caused to poison the air for hundreds of yards around it, so that the birds shun it, and vegetation beneath its branches is destroyed. At this day, in some countries, amulets are worn against disease and tribulations, which shows that, while science has explained away almost all superstitions, an inherent love of the marvelous and hidden obtains some credulity for these idle whims. A passage from an ancient Welsh law affords a somewhat ingenious argument in favor of the use of wax candles in churches: "Bees derive their origin from Paradise, and because of the sin of man did they come from thence, and God conferred on them His blessing, and therefore mass can not be chanted without their wax!" Paris is the headquarters of the Thirteenthers. Now that the republic has entered upon the thirteenth year of its existence, in circumstances of stress and doubt such as heft that most unlucky of numbers, Frenchmen remember that the thirteenth year has been a year of doom to every government which the present century has witnessed in France. Thirteen years after his elevation to autocratic power, the first Napoleon began his disastrous Russian campaign. Thirteen years after the Restoration, the fate of the Bourbons was sealed by that first reactionary coup d'état which led to the formation of the Polignac ministry and brought on the revolution of July. In the thirteenth year of the reign of Louis Philippe the tragic death of his son, the Duke of Orléans, blasted the hopes of his house. In the thirteenth year of the Second Empire the fatal Mexican expedition was undertaken. And we are now in the thirteenth year of the Third Republic. And though Frenchmen have not noticed the alarming fact—the Third Republic is the thirteenth government that has been known in France since the downfall of the old régime was announced by the capture of the Bastille. Thus runs the succession: Louis XVI., the Republic, the Directory, the Consulate, the Consulate for Life, the First Empire, the First Restoration, the Hundred Days, the Second Restoration, the Monarchy of July, the Second Republic, the Second Empire, and the Third Republic! Tradition also goes to show that there are many superstitions concerning musical instruments. The horn of Roland is heroic and superb when the preux chevalier, in distress in the ravines of Roncevaux, blows in it with a furious blast that the blood spurts from his mouth and his temples split. His cry of despair pierces the rocks; it is like a death-rattle cleaving the air; at a distance of thirty leagues it pierces the ear of Charlemagne, who feels the hero's soul passing in it. The horn of Oberon is mocking, comic, and fantastic, as it is fitting that the instrument that the King of the Elves should be; all who hear it are obliged to dance. In Weiland's ballad, the chevalier Huon, surprised by the Calif at the feet of his daughter, the beautiful Rezia, is condemned to the stake together with his lady-love. But, at the moment when the faggots are lighted, Huon puts to his lips the magic horn that Oberon gave him. At the first blast the whole town is seized with vertigo; agas, imauns, muftis, pachas, and dervishes, with their fantastic pointed bonnets, begin to turn furiously and form an immense farandole around the pyre. In Norway, the genius Fossegrin teaches the violin, in the night of Holy Thursday, to any person who sacrifices to him a white goat and throws it into a cascade flowing northward, taking care to turn away his head. The genius then seizes the right hand of his pupil, and moves it over the strings of the violin until the blood comes out under the nails. The apprentice is thenceforward a master, and his enchanted violin will make trees dance and stay rivers in their course.

SAN FRANCISCO, December, 1882.

R. S. F.

The sestina is the most complicated and difficult of all the old Provencal forms of verse. It was invented by Arnaut Daniel, a Provencal troubadour of the end of the thirteenth century. It consists of six six-lined stanzas, each of which ends with the same six words, not rhyming, but arranged in a prescribed order, and it concludes with an envoy of three lines, each of which ends with one of the six words, and three of the final words, three in the body of the lines, and three in the envoy. The sestina was first written in the English language, Mr. Edmund W. first, and Mr. Harrison K. Lewis in the second. There have been more difficult ones since, but the one in the adjoining column is believed to be the most difficult. The one in the adjoining column is believed to be the most difficult. The one in the adjoining column is believed to be the most difficult.

The B'iled Owl.—A Christmas Story of San Francisco in 1982.

By DAN. O'CONNELL.

"In his chamber, weak and dying,
Was the Norman baron lying."

PIERRE," said Baron Shandygaff, "bring me a looking-glass."

There were tears in the eyes of the dumb old servitor, as he hastened to obey his dying master's request. The baron gazed at the mirror and sighed.

"I am a sad wreck," he said, slowly, "a sad wreck, Pierre. Has the Duke of Yerba Buena yet called to inquire after my health?"

"He has not, my lord; but the Earl of Rincon Point sent his regards."

"Ha!" growled the sick man, "no word from Yerba Buena. Pierre, my ledger."

The valet brought a ponderous tome, and opened it at "Y." The baron ran his emaciated fingers down a long line of figures, and with a stub pencil cast them up.

"Yerba Buena," he said, "owes me forty thousand dollars, but partially secured by notes and mortgage. I would be a sad loss to his grace," he added, grimly; "a sad loss. But I may not die yet. Pierre, summon the countess."

While the baron's servant is on his way down the great marble stairway, we will explain to the reader that the scene of this tale is laid in the year 1982; that a magnificent feudal aristocracy has been established in San Francisco, and all the Pacific States; that twenty-five years before the opening of our story, republicanism was voted a delusion and a bore, and all men who could pay for the distinction were invited to step up the Patent Office and buy their titles; and that the utmost harmony prevailed among the patricians and the plebeians.

Baron Shandygaff, though not the highest in rank, was one of the wealthiest of the new aristocracy. Besides nine pawn-shops in the most populous portions of the city, he owned a vast extent of territory in San Mateo and Marin counties. It had been an unhealthy Christmas, and the baron, while appraising a fifty-vara lot in the Western Addition, which the owner desired to mortgage, caught cold, and was in a very bad way. But let us return to the castle, which, from the summit of Telegraph Hill, frowned over the humbler dwellings of the baron's retainers.

"My gracious lord," sobbed the beautiful countess, falling on her knees at the invalid's bedside, "has the gruel done you any good?"

Esther Litchestein was of Jewish birth, and had been wedded, when quite young, to the baron, who was anxious that his progeny should have a natural taste for the small-loan-deposit business, and therefore married into this comparatively humble family.

"Very little," said Shandygaff, querulously. "Who was that I heard thumping the piano in the front parlor?"

"Only my Cousin Isaac," said the countess, while a faint blush overspread her exquisite features.

"And what does Isaac here?" asked the baron, suspiciously.

"He came hither to tell me about the Yom Kippur, and to show me a most beautiful diamond, on which he has made a small advance."

"Ah, a diamond!" said the baron, brightening. "Show him hither."

YERBA BUENA TOWERS.

John, second Duke of Yerba Buena, was a gay and careless child of fortune. Having lost his patrimony when quite a boy at three-card monte, he made a second raise by selling an alleged copper mine on the Oakland flats to a syndicate of English capitalists. The latter endeavored to have the duke punished for this outrageous fraud, but as all international law regarding such matters had been nullified, they could only write letters about him to the San Francisco newspapers, which were published at so much a line. Finding this too expensive, they gave it up, and the duke continued the leader of Oakland society. He had built a light bridge from Goat Island, where Yerba Buena Towers stood, to the Alameda shores, upon which a sentry paced to and fro to stop all tradesmen who could not give the countersign.

"We shall have a merry day of it," said the duke to his boon companion, Lord Saucelito, also an impoverished nobleman, "a merry day of it, Saucelito. Christmas Eve to-morrow, and, as I am a living duke, there is not a turkey on the island."

"Can't you borrow one?" suggested Saucelito, gloomily. The duke laughed hoarsely.

"Nary a borrow," he said, shortly.

"Or steal one?" continued Saucelito.

"Three of my retainers, Michael, Pat, and Fritz, are now lying in the east wing of the castle, plum-full of bird-shot. No, no; the neighbors are too fly. Pat will never sit down again, and I had Doctor Antonio, my physician, out this morning looking for Fritz's ear, which is lying somewhere in the bush."

"Then what shall we have for dinner?" asked Saucelito.

"Clams and tom cods—devil a thing else I can think of—that is, if we are lucky enough to find any," said Yerba Buena.

"Couldn't you negotiate a loan?" asked Saucelito.

"I can negotiate nothing. Nobody will play pedro with me now, or throw dice, or pull straws, or match half-dollars. I tell you, my lord, it is all u. p., and if we want a Christmas dinner, we must rush in on some other crowd. Hush—here the duchess."

Duchess of Yerba Buena was a beautiful woman; tall, and, with the exception of a slight stoop, contracted life when hanging over what is facetiously known as the Irish piano, (to the practical, wash-board,) was in every respect a most perfect female. She was very respectful to her noble husband, who, to satisfy a judgment for the amount of a wash-bill contracted in early life, had placed a ducal coronet upon her brows.

"What would it please your grace to have for dinner Christmas day?" she asked, with a low obeisance.

"What's in the larder, Bridget?" inquired the duke.

"Wan box of sardines, a half keg of mackerel, the worst half of a sea-gull pie, and a two-gallon demijohn of whisky," said the duchess.

"Leave us, Bridget," said the duke, nervously, "leave us—but stay; send one of my retainers hither with the whisky and my tablets. I myself will draw up the bill-of-fare."

THE LOVERS.

"And you love me, dearest; you love your own Lucius?"

"How often, then, giddy hoy, must I confess that my heart is wholly thine?"

"Every moment, every precious moment, Bedelia," and Lucius Shandygaff, heir-apparent to the Shandygaff estates, pressed his glowing lips to Lady Bedelia's cherry-ripe mouth, the sweet Bedelia, only daughter of the ducal house of Yerba Buena. Of course, their parents knew nothing of this attachment. It was not meant they should until Lucius, himself a millionaire, should hire a Whitehall boat, pull over to Goat Island, and demand his sweetheart's hand from her haughty father. Lucius was the superintendent of the Shandygaff pawn-shops, and displayed a keenness and attention to the duties of his office which delighted his father. The needy customer, who tried to play an oriole chain on Lucius for the real metal, quickly found himself in the wrong shop. Between Lucius and a sucker lay miles and miles of ocean. He had his mother's nose, and the sharp, pungent wit of his father. The nose was useful to his profession, and the wit endeared him to the fair sex. He first met Lady Bedelia at a Sunday picnic, and it was indeed a case of love at first sight. They ate sandwiches and drank lemonade together, and when they parted it was with the understanding that whenever Bedelia wanted matinee tickets she had only to say the word. Now, on this December evening, as they stood hand in hand on the sea-wall, and gazed over the sparkling waters of the bay, they felt that no power on earth could ever divide their paths. Saucelito had, it is true, cast languishing eyes on Bedelia, but Saucelito was flat broke, and most of his broad acres in Marin County had passed into the hands of the Baron of Shandygaff. He still owned the ruins of a few ancient yacht clubs, but they were not negotiable property.

"We are wretchedly poor, Lucius," said Lady Bedelia, breaking the long silence. "My pa, the duke, has forfeited his credit in every grocery store in Oakland. It was only the other day that Lord Pretzel, who keeps that big beer saloon, threatened to sue him if he did not settle right away."

"I know he is gone in, financially—a total wreck, in fact," said Shandygaff. "We have his family jewels, and the interest is so long over-due that I know he will never pay it. Last Wednesday, I myself advanced him nine dollars and seventy-five cents on your mother's coronet. But what does that matter? I have enough for all. We will give the duke a fresh start—say, in the dry goods business, because it would not do to trust him with a saloon. Or, as he is fond of the sea, a small junk store might meet his views. We'll find something for him to do, never you fear."

"My brave, brave hoy," cried Bedelia, joyously; "you are too good, and too sweet," and again the lovers embraced, heedless of the hoarse cackle of a cynical crab-fisher, who sat with his legs dangling over the wharf. Arm in arm they wandered toward North Beach, while the crab-fisher, muttering "I guess there's a piece in this for me," gathered up his nets and ran swiftly toward the iron gates of Shandygaff Castle.

THE INVITATION.

"Shandygaff Castle, December 24, 1982.

"The Baron and Lady Shandygaff present their compliments to the Duke and Duchess of Yerba Buena and the Lady Bedelia, and request the pleasure of their company at Shandygaff Castle to dinner on Christmas day. The Baron and Lady Shandygaff sincerely hope that no previous engagement will interfere with the compliance of the Duke and Duchess of Yerba Buena and their charming daughter with this request."

Such was the note that was handed to the Duke of Yerba Buena on Christmas eve by the faithful Fritz, who looked indeed an unsightly object with his single ear, Doctor Antonio having failed to find the other in the chaparral.

"What the dickens does this mean?" inquired the duke of his crony, Saucelito, who was partially intoxicated from his repeated calls on the demijohn that stood between the pair. "Shandygaff hates me like poison. I have sent all my plate to his pawn-shops; he has all our family jewels. I fear he has foreclosed the mortgages he holds on my Contra Costa and San Mateo properties. Now, what the deuce can this mean?"

"Give it up," replied Saucelito, with a hiccup.

"You are a thick-headed pig," said the duke, angrily. "What do you suppose I keep you in whisky for, if you can not answer an occasional conundrum?"

"Give it up," chuckled the tipsy peer.

"I was about to propose that you should come disguised as one of my retainers, and fall in for a share of the cold victuals," said the duke, angrily; "but I've changed my mind. You'd get drunk, and give me away early in the evening. Now you can stay here and make a meal on the salt mackerel." And, with a contemptuous scowl at his dissipated friend, the duke left the apartment to see if his duchess could throw any light upon the unexpected invitation.

The partially convalescent Baron Shandygaff sat in his bed, propped up with pillows. Before him stood a ragged, evil-smelling crab-fisher.

"You are sure the tale you told me yesterday is true?" said the baron. "Mind, fellow, your miserable carcass shall hang from the outer walls if I discover that your story is false. You saw Lord Lucius kiss my enemy's daughter?"

"I did," replied the spy, "and she kissed him back. They was as thick as a pair of turtle doves, and they talked of getting married; and I think I heard him say that you wasn't long for this world, anyhow, and that it was a good riddance of bad rubbish."

The baron ground his teeth. "Go," he said, hoarsely. "Come here the day after to-morrow, and you shall be rewarded for your information. And on your way down, fellow, send me the cook."

The crab-fisher was not the only one who left the room. As the baron turned his head toward the wall, muttering curse words, Lord Lucius Shandygaff crept noiselessly out from under his father's bed, and made his exit unperceived by his fuming and excited parent.

"The dastard!" said Lucius. "The lying son of a starfish! But I'll be even with him, the clam-hearted tramp! I'll have my revenge."

THE BANQUET.

The grand banquet hall of Shandygaff castle was gloriously decorated with evergreens, and crimson berries, and mistletoe (gathered at a vast expense in Mendocino County), and the huge yule log blazed upon the hearth. Attired in the garb of waiters stood all the assistants—clerks, cuspidor-tenders, book-keepers, etc.—of the nine pawn-shops, for Baron Shandygaff hated needless outlay, and counted Christmas in as a working day. The baron, himself, sat at the head of the table, and was still weak and languid, though his eyes glowed with a peculiar and haleful light. Behind Lady Shandygaff's chair stood the devoted Isaac, in a white apron. On the baron's right were the Duke and Duchess of Yerba Buena. On his left Lord Lucius, and the lovely Lady Bedelia, who wore an exquisite pea-green satin, and had sham-rock in her hair. Behind the duke was Saucelito, in an impenetrable disguise, consisting of a hurly wig and a false beard. The unfortunate peer had begged so hard to be taken along that the good-natured duke did not have the heart to refuse him.

Shandygaff, who was an eminently religious nobleman, said grace, and the feast began. Lord Lucius looked pale and determined as the crab-fisher, also in disguise, brought in the soup.

"I drink your grace's health," said the baron, howling sardonically to his guest.

"Good luck. May the Lord love you and not call for you too soon," said the duke, cheerily, draining his glass.

After the soup came the fish, and then the baron arose, and thumping on the table with the haft of his carving-knife, called for silence.

"Mighty early in the feast for the toasts to begin," whispered the duke to his wife.

Shandygaff's brow was black as thunder. His frame trembled like an aspen. The veins on his forehead looked swollen almost to bursting, as, in a hoarse voice, he began:

"May it please your grace of Yerba Buena, I, an humble baron, invited you to this feast, and your duchess, and your daughter. To eat turkey? No. To get drunk at my expense? No. To what, then? To pierce your proud heart, haughty and poverty-stricken noble, whose daughter dared to ensnare my only son, the heir of all my possessions. What, ho, without there, cook!"

THE B'ILED OWL.

Before the fierce yell of the baron had ceased to echo in the vaulted chamber, a huge platter containing an immense owl was placed before Shandygaff. The guests were speechless with amazement as the baron, with one mighty stroke of his carver, severed the owl in twain, and lo! a large bundle of papers was disclosed. "Behold!" yelled Shandygaff; "Behold the foreclosures on your estates! Behold the evidences of your ruin! Behold!"

"Silence, Baron Shandygaff!"

It was Lord Lucius who spoke. With eyes aflame, and in the voice of a first-class hoatswain the young nobleman continued: "Foreclosures, eh! O blind and miserable man, that I should be condemned to call you father! See! see!" and he tore from the dish the package and waved it aloft. "These," he shouted, "are your price of Yerba Buena, the pawn-tickets for your family jewels, all marked 'received payment,' and these the releases of all your mortgages. Ay, tremble in your chair, proud Baron Shandygaff, and know that I did not learn to knock down for nothing. Yes, my darling Bedelia," turning to the weeping girl, "I always had the key of the till."

When, two weeks afterward, Baron Shandygaff was able to crawl down-stairs, he was an altered man. The first evidence of returning vigor that he displayed was to hang the crab-fisher, and the next to bless and forgive his noble son and the entire Yerba Buena family. At the nuptials of Lord Lucius and the lovely Lady Bedelia, he presented the blushing bride with a magnificent necklace of diamonds, (unredeemed,) and it was not many years ere the united families of Shandygaff and Yerba Buena owned every pawn shop in this vast and prosperous city.

The Lost Ship Marigold.

A STRANGE TALE OF AN INHABITED ISLAND IN THE PACIFIC, NOT UPON THE CHARTS.

By ROBERT DUNCAN MILNE.

"On clearing the straits Drake accordingly held a northwest course, and in two days the fleet had advanced seventy leagues. Here it was overtaken by a violent and steady gale from the northeast, which drove them into 57° south latitude, and two hundred leagues to the west of Magellan's Straits. * * * On the 24th, (September, 1578,) the weather became more moderate, the wind shifted, and they partly retraced their course, for seven days standing to the northeast, during which land was seen, and near which a vain attempt was made to anchor. Their troubles did not end here. Once more the wind got back to its old quarter, and with great violence; and on the 30th the Marigold was separated from the Elizabeth and the Golden Hind, as Drake, on entering the South Sea, had named his ship, in compliment, it is said, to his patron, Sir Christopher Hatton. They made the land, and was never heard of. We do not even find a conjecture breathed of the fate of this ship."—Lives and Voyages of Drake, Cavendish, and Dampier.

"AND so you have got back from your cruise, have you, Dick?" I said, as I casually met an old chum on the street the other day. "Had a good time, eh?"

"Well, I should say so, rather," replied Dick, with a mysterious air. "But I haven't time to tell you about it now. Come up to my room this evening, and I'll tell you something that will shake your faith in the Spencerian theory of homogeneity tending toward heterogeneity, and all that sort of thing. I must go now. Mind you come. Ta-ta." And he fore I could answer he had disappeared down Pine Street.

Dick Ferrier was a man of leisure, possessed of enough money to take things easy; somewhat of a dilettante, too, in art and letters, and, as I thought it possible he might have picked up something interesting in his late cruise with Sir Harry Buckstone, I determined to accept his invitation.

And now about the cruise I refer to. Last summer a gentleman of fortune, an Englishman, Sir Harry Buckstone by name, visited San Francisco in his yacht. During his stay here, Dick Ferrier—everybody calls him Dick—was introduced to him, and through community of tastes and parity of age—each was about thirty-five or so—that sort of companionship common to men of the world with plenty of money and nothing to do grew up between them. Thus it came about that when Sir Harry got tired of the land and proposed a cruise on the Pacific, he asked Dick to accompany him, and Dick went. I do not know that they had any particular destination in view when they started. I rather think not. Nor did Dick limit himself to time—he did not need to do so.

"Well, what about that cruise, Dick?" I said, after appropriating the most comfortable easy-chair near the fire, and settling back to the enjoyment of a Havana. "What have you been doing with yourself since you left here? More than six months ago, isn't it?"

"Ah, my boy," placidly answered Dick, as he pushed the decanters, "I have sailed half round the world since then. Had a splendid time. But I'm not going to give you a full account of my travels; that is, not just now. Life is too short. But I do want to narrate one little bit of South Sea experience that, I think, will interest you in the unromantic age," he concluded, with a knowing twinkle.

"Agreed," I answered; "I give you my word I won't make any noise until your narrative either grows miserably dull or supremely impossible. As to romancing, I won't give you credit for that—you haven't got the imagination for it. If you can only say what you have to say briefly and without long-winded digressions, you will find me the most indulgent of listeners. If not—well, then—"

"All right," laughed Dick, good-naturedly; "here goes: It was last June, wasn't it," he began, "that Sir Harry's yacht was here? Yes; I remember it was somewhere about the middle of the month that we sailed, or steamed, I should say, out of the harbor. The Firefly, as you know, is a quick runner—thinks nothing of fifteen knots under a full head. Sir Harry had just come from Australia, you know, via the Fijis and Sandwich Islands, and his past experiences had only whetted his appetite for more; so I was not surprised, after getting outside the heads, that he should drop the abrupt remark: 'What do you say, old fellow, if we take in the islands again—those South Sea groups, you know? No end of variety. Charming, I assure you.' Of course I professed myself delighted, and we steamed merrily south through the finest imaginable Pacific weather. We struck out in the direction of the Fijis, and stayed there a couple of weeks in the biggest of them, all of which was very new and interesting to me; but, as Sir Harry had been there before, and only dropped in to get a favorite cane or something he had left, he presently voted it slow; and, after showing me round sufficiently, as he thought, one fine morning we dropped out of the beautiful bay.

"Now," said he, "which shall it be, Auckland or Valparaiso? Coal we must have. What do you say if we strike for Valparaiso, and visit Pitcairn Island on the way? I have a fancy to see these curious people."

"Of course I was delighted, and away we went. Pitcairn Island, as perhaps you know, is a lovely little dot, lying some fifteen hundred miles south of the line, and between two and three thousand from South America. You know that, as it is out of the track of ships, it is seldom visited, and that the arrival of a ship there is an event of great rejoicing. Well, we got along swimmingly for about a week, when we experienced, for the first time, some uncommonly rough weather. Of course this was disagreeable; but we took the pitching about and the smashing of the glass in the cabin, and even the demolition of the last but one of our cases of champagne, philosophically enough, and as the fortune of war; but when it came to the breaking of a blade of our screw, we felt that it was piling on the agony a little too much, and indulged in some appropriate comments on our elemental luck. That didn't mend matters, however, one particle; and, as, in addition to being blown out of our course, we didn't get a sight of the sun for a matter of five days, we could tell only by dead reckoning that we were a good way south of where we ought to have been. Such things, however, don't last forever, and when it cleared up one night, and our captain could use his sextant, he gave our latitude as—let me see; I've got it down in my pocket-book. Yes; here it is—as 33° 24' S., 132° 15' W. I remember noting it down particularly, as Sir Harry and myself were curious to know where we were, and went off immediately to look up the chart.

"Not so bad after all, gentlemen," said the captain, as he looked over our shoulders; "we are not quite five hundred miles south of Pitcairn Island, and if we have any luck we shall make her inside of three days. Meantime we must lay to till morning. Some of the tackle wants fixing."

"Lay to we did; and, as I was performing my ablutions next morning, what should I hear but Sir Harry's voice shouting cheerily outside my state-room:

"'Dick, I say, get out here. There's an island lying a few miles east of us which the captain says isn't on the chart. Just think of it; we're discoverers. Names in history and all that sort of thing. What fun!'"

"Of course I dressed in double-quick time, and got on deck, and sure enough there was the island, lying, I should say, some four or five miles off, and looking as pretty as a picture. There stood Sir Harry and the captain side by side, each with a big telescope glued to his face, and gazing with rapt attention.

"And, by God, there are people on it!" exclaimed the captain, as he shut up his glass with a snap.

"'Very strange that it isn't on the chart, isn't it, captain?'" remarked Sir Harry, inquiringly.

"Well," said the captain, reflectively. "I don't suppose a ship gets into this section once in twenty years, and only then when she's blown in like we've been. You see that island lies five hundred miles further off the line of travel than Pitcairn does, and she's on the direct route from nowhere to nowhere. So, it ain't as strange as it looks. One thing's certain, that island ain't on any chart; for I've got all the latest, and I have likewise verified my calculations this morning."

"All right," said Sir Harry; "just bring us as near as you can and we'll land. This is something like an adventure—eh, Dick? An undiscovered island—inhabited, too! Won't the natives be puzzled to see us! The usual course in such cases is for all the natives to take to the hills, isn't it? Not much of hills, either, are they? How big do you think it is, captain?"

"Well, that's the funny part of it," replied the captain. "There seems to be some six or eight miles of a coast line on this side, anyway. But, you see, there's no land of any great height there. Ships might pass within fifty miles of it and never see it; and, as I said, she lies hundreds of miles off all the lines of travel."

"As we got nearer the shore Sir Harry and I kept our telescopes to our eyes, to make out what sort of natives they were. Some scores of them had collected upon the beach and were watching our approach. Before we could make out much about the people, we could plainly see, about half a mile inland, a village of houses, some of them evidently wooden ones and painted, others made of mats and poles, such as we had seen among the Fijis.

"That looks uncommonly like civilization," said Sir Harry. "Can you catch what sort of dress they wear? Seems to me they have clothes on down to the feet, at any rate."

"As we got nearer I saw that Sir Harry was right, and that the people were, at all events, rigged something like ordinary Christians, though I couldn't for the life of me make out at first what I did see. Well, when we got within about a quarter of a mile of the shore the landings grew shallow; so Sir Harry and I got into the captain's boat, and they pulled us to the beach. On our way we kept getting a better and better view of the islanders, and Sir Harry said to the captain:

"'You must have made a mistake, Biggs. These people are no savages. Why, they are dressed in some sort of long clothes, though I can't tell yet what they are. This is no undiscovered island!'"

"Phew!" said the captain; "I'm blessed if I can understand it. I'd swear the place ain't on the chart, and I'd swear that my observations are all right, too. But if I ever saw anything like this—well, I am blown," and he whistled in a mystified way.

"By this time we had got to the beach, and jumped on shore, and if ever I was staggered in my life I was then. You know I've seen a good deal, and I've read a good deal, and I'm not usually pulled up with a round turn by anything that isn't a pretty long way out of the ordinary, but if I ever—if I hope to see— Here Dick got completely at a loss for words, and came down on the table with a bang that made the decanters and glasses dance.

"All right," said I; "till you get calm enough to go on in a rational manner, I'll take the hint and fortify myself for the forthcoming disclosures. You've been dull enough hitherto, in all conscience. Your wine is infinitely superior to your story."

"All right," said Dick; "cback away. But if I don't make you think as I do before I'm done, you may put me down for—where was I? Oh, yes; on the beach. Well, the three of us, Sir Harry, the captain, and I, left the sailors in the boat and jumped ashore. About twenty paces in front of us, and about the same distance in advance of the big crowd I told you we saw at first, stood four of the queerest, the quaintest, the most nondescript—well, I'm stumped if I can find words to express it. Did you ever see any of Burnand's hurlesque operas—the old ones, I mean, where a chorus is sung by a quartet of heterogeneous anomalies in the most utterly fantastic dress it is possible to conceive? Well, the four figures who stood before us reminded me more forcibly of that than anything else.

"Let me describe them in detail: The right 'end man,' so to speak, of the four, had on a mantle reaching to about his knees, once evidently gaudy, but now faded from age, and here and there patched with some different material. The legs, from the knees down, were encased in boots of untanned leather, such as are ordinarily worn by the stage brigand. A long white beard fell from a rather pleasant-looking brown face, while on the head was a species of leather slouch-hat with a broad brim. The next was a well-proportioned, black-bearded young fellow, in a short mantle of faded silk, his lower extremities likewise sheathed in galigaskins of fine rawhide. This one held his hat in his hand, and it had a long feather in it. At his hip hung a sword in a curiously chased sheath. The other two were middle-aged men, attired in old-fashioned leathern doublets and long rawhide boots, with antiquated cutlasses strapped to their waists. Each posed in a different way, and all were evidently trying to make an impression. The expression on their faces was evidently meant to give an idea of importance, and each, in his own attitude, remained as if posing for a photograph. Anything more ludicrous and comical I never saw in my life, but I can't expect you to have any proper conception of it from my lame description. The effect on us, however, was irresistible. For one moment I was utterly dumfounded and nonplussed. The next, I came to a sense that Sir Harry was in fits behind his handkerchief, while the worthy captain stood like a statue, head thrown back, mouth wide open, and eyes staring out of his head. If anything was wanting to complete the picture and my utter demoralization, it was this. I gave vent to a guffaw before which an Apache war-whoop would seem tame, and which had the effect of exciting extreme commotion in the ranks behind the quartet, which had meanwhile been coming gradually closer, and many of whom then and there turned and fled precipitately, with a pack of howling children at their heels. This, however, broke up the matinee, and brought all hands, as it were, to a sense of the situation. It was now in order for both sides to say something, and if I was utterly demoralized before, I was now routed, horse, foot, and dragons. May I be struck dumb and paralyzed on the spot, if that old fellow with the long, gray beard and brigand boots didn't amble up, with a Chesterfieldian bow, and say:

"'May't please your worships to go with us and taste of our cheer? Ye are right welcome to this island. We will entreat you well, for I bethink me ye do come from the land of England, of which our forefathers spake. We are right glad that ye have come, I warrant you. Suffer us to conduct you unto our homes.'"

"'Yea, prithee, fair sirs, we entreat you,' chimed in the other three.

"Sir Harry at once grasped the situation, and politely accepted the proffered hospitality. We then went along with our entertainers in the direction of the village I told you we saw from the ship, followed and surrounded, at a respectful distance, by the rest of the folks, who watched us narrowly and curiously. After a walk of about half a mile, during which we passed many cottages surrounded by gardens and plats of cultivated ground, we reached the village. This consisted of some forty or fifty cottages, of various sizes, some of them built of logs, some simply of poles with coconut matting flung over them, others of boards with roofs and gables which would compare favorably with similar structures of our own, one or two of them painted with a sort of ochre. All of the better class had doors and windows—that is, window-shaped openings protected by lattice work. Of course, we were puzzled to account for it all, and on the way up asked if it was actually true that they had never seen a ship before. The old man said that he remembered having, on one occasion, while on the top of the hills, seen a ship sailing on the horizon very far to the east, and at another time one was driven past the island by a storm; but none had ever stopped there, and no stranger had ever been seen at the island, either in his time or within the traditions which he possessed. You may be sure that this assertion piqued our curiosity still further, and made us more anxious to solve the enigma of what it all meant; and Master Martin—for so the old man called himself—promised to satisfy us on all these points before we left.

At last we stopped before one of the most pretentious of the cottages, on the threshold of which we were met by two females—one middle-aged, who was introduced to us as Dame Elizabeth Martin; the other, a mere girl of sixteen or so, as Amy Martin. The dame was like most elderly females, with a decided leaning to embonpoint, but the young lady was a veritable dusky beauty—bright, flashing eyes, rosy lips, jet black hair, piquant features, and so on. What did she wear? Well, you know I'm not much of a Jenkin; there is one thing I am more ignorant about than a woman's dress. Old women can't be made to witching by any quantity of diamonds and furbel per contra, young ones, if they are bewitching, can't have their attractions obscured by even a domino. Probably the old Greek tunic would come nearer to describing the feminine dress than anything else. It was loose, caught up by a girdle somewhere in the regions of the waist. It was flowing. It seemed to fit the body, and yet fell in folds. It left the neck and arms bare from the shoulders down. It was made of some material resembling coarse linen. It was bleached; and, above all, it was clean. And now you have all I know about it. Well, the ladies courtesied, and in that quaint old Elizabethan language, with which we are familiar in the pages of Ben Jonson and old Roger Ascham, asked us to be seated; the seats were very passable high-backed chairs adorned with an attempt at carving. There was already a table spread with a snowy cloth in the middle of the apartment, which was of the capacity of an ordinary family room. The floor was strewn with rushes. A large fire-place, lined with stone, occupied nearly the whole of one end. In fact, the whole thing smacked of some bygone period. It was as if we had suddenly dropped from the nineteenth century to the seventeenth, and, as it turned out, to all intents and purposes we had. It was funny at first to hear "prithee" and "withal" used in the ordinary conversation of life, but the effect was delicious through the knowledge that the expressions were natural. So, too, even when the old lady soundly berated a swarthy menial who brought in a roast kid upon a huge brown crockery platter, the incongruity of a dark, olive-hued matron in a loose Greek tunic, saying, 'A murrain on thee, wench! Canst not abide till the fair guests be seated?' was atoned for by the natural simplicity of the expression.

"An't please your worships to be seated, we will fall to," was the invitation to which we responded by bringing our chairs close up to the table, the fair Amy being flanked by Sir Harry on the one side and Master Marigold Thomson, the young fellow with the dandy doublet and hose, on the other, while another female of the family was similarly cavaliered by myself, and on the other side of the festive board the worthy captain looked like a modern brass-buttoned sailor trussed up between two of the ancient buccaneers or swash-bucklers of the Spanish Main. With a dusky Aspasia in the forties at the head, and a dark-skinned Polonius at the foot of the table, I doubt if any stage burlesque ever furnished a parallel. The dinner was plain, but well cooked, the company being served indiscriminately upon wooden trenchers and brown crockery plates. There were knives and spoons, but no forks. Master Martin, our host, carved the kid by simply taking a good grip of the head with his left hand, while with his right he cut off chunks of the meat, which he put upon our platters as they were handed up to him. There were baked and boiled yams upon the table, with some other native succulent vegetables; what the old lady called a 'manchet' of wheaten bread, with a dish of goat's-milk butter; fruit, such as mangoes, bananas, and pine-apples. After the roast kid a dish of wild ducks was brought in, with eggs and cheese. And while this was going on, you must not suppose that we had nothing to drink.

"Dickon," called Master Martin, in commanding tones, to a bare-footed helot who hovered about, 'get thee to the huttery, and fetch a measure from yon cask we broached yestereven, when we saw their worships' ship over against us; and, sirrah, see to't that a goodly portion of sugar be mingled with the hippocras for the dames. Thou art ever amiss therein. An' thou fail in this, look to thyself; for, truly, I will swinge thee roundly. Begone! hie thee!' then, apologetically to Sir Harry, 'I crave your pardon, fair knight, but these caitiff knaves must be strictly entreated, else will they most woefully malinge. Is it ever so in thy country?'

"To which Sir Harry gravely replied that it was, and so the banquet went merrily on. It was a sight for the gods to see our worthy captain bobnobbing and carrying on an animated conversation with the buccaneers at the other side of the table; for all tongues were loosened under the influence of the wine, which was old and really fair. I could see, too, that Sir Harry was making his way in the good graces of damsel Amy, much to the perturbation of Master Marigold Thomson. I, of course, tried to do the agreeable, under difficulties, with my early English partner in the Greek tunic."

Here Dick paused. "Just show that decanter this way, old fellow; talking makes one terribly dry."

"Now, look here, Dick," I said, with besetting solemnity, "I've stood this long enough. What on earth has come over you to-night? Do you expect me to believe such a yarn as this? Who ever heard of grapes, or wheat, or any stuff fit to make cloth out of, growing on a desert island in the Pacific? By your own admission, no ships had ever touched there within the memory of tradition, and yet you dress up your natives in doublets, and tunics, and hose and leather boots, and silk mantles, and swords, and so forth. I suppose you'll tell me next that they were adepts at poker, and crack hands at billiards. You're laying it on too thick; you are, indeed."

"I grant it does look pretty absurd," weakly conceded Dick; "but before I'm done I will convince you, at all events, of the possibility of all I've told you, and leave the verification of it to certain parties who will be here in a day or two. The yacht, you know, stopped at Wilmington, as Sir Harry wished to visit an old chum of his now staying in Los Angeles, while I came on here ahead of them. I hope you won't impeach their testimony, at least," and Dick assumed an expression of injured innocence and conscious rectitude.

"Well," he continued, "the dinner passed off without a flaw. A perfect entente cordiale had been established, and we rose from the table in time to see the bare legs of black Dickon in hot pursuit of some of the villagers, who had transgressed the bounds of propriety so far as to gather unnoticed round the door while we were eating. After dinner we produced our cigar-cases and astonished the natives by smoking. As may be imagined, they did not follow our example. It now became in order to arrive at a solution of the enigma which had been presented to us, and to this end Master Martin called upon to enlighten us. Sitting down in the shade of a patriarchal palm, the old man told us, as far as he knew, the traditional history of the island, which had been handed down from generation to generation; but wisely adding that such a history would seem more authentic if supported by some extraneous evidence, he went into the house, and returned in a few minutes with several articles—one of them a volume bound in black leather with silver clasps. This proved to be a black-letter edition of Edward VI.'s Bible, printed upon parchment—nothing else would have stood the wear and tear and thumbing of centuries. This, he told us, was the only book on the island, and from it he and all I saw around me had learned to read—that is, all of the upper class; for even in this small and simple community the lines of caste were strictly drawn. Besides the Bible, Master Martin showed us a manuscript book, which proved to be a ship's log, much of which was blurred and rendered illegible by sea water and extreme age, but from which I made these extracts from the last few entries, for your especial satisfaction," and Dick produced from his pocket-book a page of manuscript of which the following is a transcript:

"* * * The xxj. of Awgust we entered the streights called Magellanes Streytes, the xxij. of the same, we arrived at an Iland where we had grete store of fowles which could not flye, of the bygness of geese; we kyde in lesse than one day above three thousand of these fowles, and victualed our selves thrwly with them, as we thought. These streights were full of watar and wodde all the waye and very hylande of both syds, in some places but a leauge in bredthe, in some the vj. September we entered the sowthe sea, where in all our beygne we never found but contrary winds and extreme tempestes and boysterous wether. * * * and Master Wyntar, qd. he, wher is your man Vlysses? by Gods lyfe yf he were my man I would cut off his ears, yea by Gods woudes I would hange hym; but wherefore truly I do not know. * * * Such an infinite number of seales as may seeme incredible to any man that hath not bene there, not fearing the presence of men; for the most of our men were upon the island for the space of fifteen days to set up a Finnesse, during which time the seales would come and slepe by them, and rather resist our men, then shue place, unless mortall blowes forced them to yeele. * * * The last of September being a very foule night, and the seas sore growne, we lost the Generalls shippe and the Eden running to the Eastward to get the shore, wherof we had sight the vij. of October, falling into a very dangerous bay full of rocks; and there we lost company of M. Drake the same night. * * * the ambuscade brake out and set upon them, and before they could recover their bowe and get her on fote they hurt all our men very sore with their arrowes. * * * John Bruer, John Marten, Thomas Flud, Tom Bruer, great Nele a dane, littell Nele a Fleming, John Gripe, John Mariner, Gregory Rayment escaped their wonds and were cured. * * * Here we do live unto this daye in grete peace and plentye, and in amitie with ye natives."

Master Dixon, wch was the Generalls brother-in-law, having much skille in weying, doth teche ye native women how to make faire cloths unto themselves of certaine plantes and trees wch doe grow here most abundantly, so we are like to have no lack of raiment whiles we stay. Likewise Nele the Fleming is no mean cordwainere wh belike I did not know till now. Likewise more of our men doe prove themselves cunning in divers ways. We have hewn unto ourselves boords in some sort from the trees that be here wherof the wodde is fayre to splitte with the ships axes. Therefrom we have bigger howses and chaires and tables. Ye whete wch we had for our hogge, and of wch were a fewe graines residue in the barge, we sowed and now have goodly harvests and brede much to our help. Ye razens wch we had a barge from the Portugals we likewise sowed their seedes wherof grow grapes. Seeing that much time hath passed without syne of ship or rescue, all save Thoms Flud and myself have taken unto themselves wives wherof they have children, by which we are much holpen. I doe thynke we shall bringe all in ye feare of Godde."

JOHN THOMSON,
Captain of ye Marigold.
At ye Iland of Malilua, this 25 day of December (Xmas.) Goddes sun his daye, as I recon in the yere of our lorde fifteen hundred eighty-three, Y years have we bene here; God save Her Majestie. J. T.

"Now, what do you say to that?" shouted Dick, triumphantly, as I finished reading. "Well, Master Martin showed us more things which had been saved from the ship—the figure-head, pieces of rope, the compass, some bows, a caliver—if you know what that is—some old cutlasses, and other articles, which were preserved with the utmost care and reverence. As to the dresses they then wore, and which had excited our sense of the ludicrous at our arrival, he explained that they were some of the original clothes of the crew of the Marigold, and had only been donned on the present occasion in deference to a sacred injunction, handed down from father to son and generation to generation, that these garments should be worn to welcome the first arrivals in, as proof of who their original wearers were. The dresses had accordingly been preserved from moth and mildew with the most reverential care, and, even after such a lapse of time, retained something of their pristine character. Marigold Thomson, for instance, the good-looking young fellow who was sweet on Master Martin's daughter, appeared, by hereditary right, in the holiday bravery of his ancestor, John Thomson, the captain of the ill-fated vessel, whose name the youth bore. It is not often that young men have the privilege of airing themselves in the toggery of an ancestor of the tenth generation, is it? And still seldomer that they would appreciate the honor, eh? Sir Harry said that at his place in England there were chests of wardrobes of dresses quite as old, but none, so far as he was aware, in such good repair. This compliment, I may add, was vastly appreciated. Well, the day wore on, and toward evening we returned to the yacht, our hosts being loth to let us go, lest they should lose us forever. Sir Harry, however, comforted them with the assurance that all the yacht's boats would return in the morning, and take as many as they could carry aboard. And so we parted."

"Well, so things went on from day to day, till at last we lived more on the island than we did on the yacht. And a beautiful place it was, and no mistake. One of those 'Summer isles of Eden, lying in dark purple spheres of sea,' that the poet sings of. Quite romantic, I assure you; and quite romantic did we get. You needn't laugh. We were in a new world, and a real one. It had its

'Quidquid agunt homines, votum, timor, ira, voluptas;' it had its loves and its strifes, its work and its merry-makings, all carried out with as much fervor as anywhere I was ever at. You mayn't give me credit for it, but I made quite a study of the whole thing. I had to do something, you know, for before we had been there a week I could tell that Sir Harry was snug in the meshes of the dimpled god. Tête-à-tête in the shade during the day, and moonlight rambles on the beach at night, tell a tale, you know; and so I killed time as best I could, by rambling myself over the island with my gun. Of course, I literally had the freedom of it, for every one was apprised of our arrival two hours after we cast anchor. As I know you are of a statistical turn of mind, I may as well tell you, prosaically, that the island was six miles long by about four in width; that its population numbered about two thousand persons, three-fourths of whom were in a sort of serfdom to the remainder; that there were cultivated fields and gardens; that there were gay-plumaged birds in the groves, and goats upon the high ground. It seems that, however it had been in former times, there was now little or no intermarrying between the two classes of the community. This social provision was, no doubt, the cause of the paucity of families—which hardly ever numbered more than one or two children. The women used the distaff and spindle—the secret of which had been, no doubt, handed down from the time when 'Master Dixon,' as the log said, first taught them the art. All the ship's iron had been long ago beaten out into axes and knives, which were now extremely scarce, and guarded with the most jealous care. A species of hard wood, something like iron-wood, provided hoes and spades, for there were no beasts of burden, and all agricultural work had to be performed by hand. The natives were adepts with the bow, and shot wild duck, which were plentiful in both the creeks, with a species of flint-head arrow. I mention this fact, not from its novelty, but because it cuts a figure in the story later on.

"Well, as I said, while I was potting wild duck upon the creeks, Sir Harry was making love to the fair Amy in the shady lanes or upon the beach. Of course, this didn't escape the notice of Master Marigold Thomson, who, I could see, eyed the pair with anything but feelings of affection. One evening as we were lying in our hammocks smoking—he swung our hammocks under a big tree near old Martin's cottage—Sir Harry began to talk.

"'Dick,' said he, 'did you ever see a girl like that? So simple, so artless, so innocent, such a beauty, so unlike those sophisticated, artificial, hot-house exotics one meets in a London drawing-room! By Jove, I've a good mind to do it.'

"'All right, old fellow, go ahead,' I said. 'I know you'll do it anyhow, so I may just as well chime in now, and be done with it.'

"'I think I can make it all right at home,' he went on. 'Of course, they'll kick at first, but I'm the party principally interested, if it comes to that.'

"'What does the girl say to it?' I said. 'Who knows but there might be some objections on that side?'

"'To-morrow I mean to ask her,' sighed Sir Harry. 'I don't think I'm mistaken in the result.'

"As we smoked dreamily on, a figure passed us in the dusk, and entered Martin's house. Presently we heard the sound of talking inside. Two male and two female voices were engaged, and, judging from the high tones employed, some exciting topic was on the tapis. After about ten minutes the door opened and Master Marigold Thomson came out, followed by old Martin, who stood in the door-way with a cocoa-nut oil lamp in his hand, and said:

"'Truly, I am sorry that thou shouldst ask this thing. Nevertheless, as thou demandest it, it must perforce be so. Prithee consider, Master Marigold, and demand it not,' and so they parted.

"'I wonder what's up now?' I said, 'The old party seems excited about something.'

"'Some family tiff, I suppose,' yawned Sir Harry, as he turned over.

"In the morning we found out what it was, and, as it turned out, it was a matter of some importance to Sir Harry, too. It seemed that there was an immemorial usage on the island that the first man who asked the hand of a maiden in marriage was conceded the preference under certain conditions. If the girl accepted him, well and good; there was no farther trouble. If she did not, she was compelled to declare her preference for some one else, and in that case the first comer had a right to challenge the favored one to a trial of skill in shooting. Whichever came off winner at this shooting-match got the girl. It was simply the old tournament in a different shape, suitable to the conditions of the place. Now, the reason for the high talking in the cottage the evening before was that young Marigold, presumably seeing which way the wind was blowing, had made a formal proposition for old Martin's daughter. The girl, thus urged, in her simplicity, and following the custom she had invariably seen around her, expressed her preference for Sir Harry, and thereupon Master Marigold had signified his intention of deciding the affair by the time-honored custom referred to. Old Martin was in a dilemma. He had either to fly in the face of an established custom, or commit a flagrant breach of hospitality. Besides, like all old people, neither he nor his worthy dame had the least suspicion of what was going on under their noses. With all their simplicity they had enough sense to see that their rules didn't apply to an outsider, and that any declaration should have come from Sir Harry. The case, however, was simply put before him as it stood, and Sir Harry answered it by simply going round to where Miss Amy stood, putting his arm round her waist, and kissing her. Nothing like simple measures in a simple community, you know. Old Martin, seeing the state of the case, thereupon tried to get Master Marigold to forego his claim, but the latter couldn't see it, and insisted on a strict observance of the letter of the law; namely, that Sir Harry should shoot with him at a distance of a hundred paces—the prize the hand of the maiden. Now, here was a quandary. Sir Harry hadn't had a bow and arrow in his hand since he was ten years old, and even then, as he ruefully remarked afterward, he couldn't hit a barn-door with it. He, however, expressed his perfect willingness to accommodate Master Marigold with rifles or revolvers. After a stormy discussion a compromise was at length effected on the basis that the match should take place for the stakes proposed, each champion to use his own weapon. This seemed fair for both parties.

"'A lucky thing for you that you liked the girl,' said I, that evening. 'Suppose it had been my Dulcinea—the maiden aunt, I mean, that sits next to me at table?'

"'Even rifles don't always carry straight,' laughed Sir Harry, 'and that reminds me that I must be remarkably careful to-morrow. I haven't shot for some time, and they say my rival is a perfect Locksley with the bow.'

"Next morning the contest began in a beautiful grassy dell, specially set apart for such encounters. All the people of the island had collected before the hour named to witness the spectacle, rendered doubly exciting by the peculiar conditions under which it took place. They ranged themselves on both sides of the dell, which was stepped off for a hundred paces by old Martin, who fulfilled in himself the functions of judge, referee, and master of ceremonies. A pole with a cross-piece at the top was stuck in the ground, and from a string attached to the end of the cross-piece hung a large mango. This was set in motion so that it swung right and left transversely to the field of vision. Whichever of the contestants hit the mango oftenest in three shots won. It was the old Elizabethan game of quintain over again. Master Marigold was on hand with a confident smile, for this was his favorite pastime, and he had practiced it ever since he could handle a bow. Sir Harry loaded his rifle with scrupulous care, for more depended upon the result than he had ever staked on the traps at Hornsey. The fair Amy was on hand, too, with her mother and maiden aunt, and the whole thing had a most picturesque and chivalric appearance. Master Marigold drew the long straw, and took his stand. Twang! went the bow. Squish! went the mango, and Master Marigold stepped jauntily aside. He had on the ancient finery, by the way, of his ancestor, the captain. Then Sir Harry took his place. Crack! went the rifle. Squish! went the second mango, and he too stepped aside, and carefully wiped the breech of his gun before reloading. It now became evident to both parties, and indeed to every one there, that this was no ordinary affair. Neither was it. Master Marigold again parted his mango fair in the centre, while Sir Harry peeled off a slice of the rind. Master Marigold again drew his arrow to the shoulder and took aim. It left the bow; but, just as it left, a bird flew out of the grove and made a peck at the fruit. The bird dropped dead, but the mango was untouched. Sir Harry politely waived the accident, and asked his rival to shoot again. This was unquestionably fair, and he did so; but this time the arrow whizzed by harmless. Possibly the accident unnerved him. Sir Harry followed, and again smashed his mango. The people cheered, and Sir Harry went over to the side of Amy, while Master Marigold, with bent head and dejected look, disappeared slowly and alone among the trees.

"Now, no doubt you will suppose that a time of regular courtship began. So it did. It began. That evening, after dinner, I was comfortably strolling along the moonlit beach smoking a cigar, and complacently appreciating the luxurious warmth and ease of my surroundings. About a hundred yards to my right I saw a couple of figures which I had no difficulty in recognizing as Sir Harry and Amy. They were strolling along as close as lovers, near where a fringe of myrtle ran down almost to the edge of the water. I was thinking over past reminiscences of the same sort, and dreamily taking in the situation in general, when whang! came a sound out of the laurel thicket. The next moment the air was convulsed with a masculine groan and a feminine shriek. I did the hundred yards between the figures and myself in less than eleven seconds, though you may not believe it, and found Sir Harry on the sand and Miss Amy engaged in tugging away at an arrow that had lodged in his back. I shoved her to one side, very impolitely I admit, but at the same time very practically, as I want you to understand, for I saw at the first pull that the arrow had done its work well, and the barb was firmly imbedded in the flesh. So I just slipped his arms out of the sleeves of his coat and waistcoat—I had been there before, you know—ripped off the back of his shirt and underclothing, and then went to work on the flesh round the barbs. I didn't wait for the hullabaloo and surgery that old Martin or any of his gang could afford, but simply cut away the meat round the barbs, and brought out the arrow. It had gone in three inches deep below the left shoulder—just the length of the flint. I'm no surgeon, but I know enough about anatomy to tell that an inch to the right would have struck either the heart or the lungs. Well, twenty seconds after he had been hit, I had him plastered up—you know I always make it a point of carrying enough plaster in my pocket-book to fix up a regiment; and by this time Amy's shrieks had brought the old man and the old woman, and about a hundred of the villagers. They came running up with lights, and crying, with that melancholy cadence which is the distinctive mark of barbaric man, as if their hearts would break.

"Sir Harry was brought in and nursed with all the possible care that simple, kind people, whose heart is in their every action, could give. Nobody could account for the catastrophe. Strange as it may seem to you, the brand of Cain had never been set upon their brows within their memory, and had been blotted out even from their dim traditions.

"Morning rose with Amy still hovering round his bed, when news was brought in of another terrible calamity. Marigold Thomson had been found, with his brains dashed out, at the foot of the highest coast bluff on the island, about a mile off.

"Now, I won't keep you much longer. Nobody ever knew who fired that arrow. If they did know, they said nothing. Poor Marigold was brought in dead. He was covered with flowers—and most beautiful, resplendent, gorgeous flowers they were, too. We buried him with true grief, true tears, and the most heartfelt feeling. Sir Harry was too weak to attend the ceremonies, but Amy did. Such a mixture of Christian form and barbaric reality as I witnessed at that funeral made a deep impression on me, and inwardly demonstrated to me that the true feelings of humanity hold a high balance on the natural side. I saw in the grief of these poor, simple folk a foretaste of the calamities which must inevitably overtake them, should they ever be brought into the vortex of so-called civilization; should commerce ever mark them for her own, bringing in her wake the companion, though antagonistic, influence of missionaries and rum. And why shouldn't these islanders feel sorry? A youth brought up among them, whom they had known from the earliest childhood, balked of his love by a woman's whim and a chance of war. Bah! And so ended, after three hundred years, the last descendant of John Thomson, captain of the Marigold, who had passed through Magellan's Straits with Sir Francis Drake, and brought his ship safe to land on an island in the South Seas. Oh, the travesty of fortune! Push that decanter this way, and light another cigar. To-morrow I shall have the pleasure of introducing you to Sir Harry and his island bride. But, to tell truth, my sympathies are with Marigold. Poor Marigold!"

When emeralds were first discovered in America, a Spaniard carried one to a lapidary in Italy, and asked him what it was worth; he was told a hundred escudos. He produced a second, which was larger; and that was valued at three hundred. Overjoyed at this, he took the lapidary to his lodging, and showed him a chestful; but the Italian, seeing so many, damped his joy by saying: "Ah ha, señor! so many—these are worth one escudo."

MAGAZINE VERSE.

The Ladies of St. James's.

A PROPER NEW BALLAD OF THE COUNTRY AND THE TOWN.

The ladies of St. James's
Go swinging to the play;
Their footmen run before them,
With a "Stand by! Clear the way!"
But Phyllida, my Phyllida!
She takes her buckled shoon,
When we go out a-courting
Beneath the harvest-moon.

The ladies of St. James's
Wear satin on their backs;
They sit all night at Ombre,
With candles all of wax;
But Phyllida, my Phyllida!
She dons her russet gown,
And runs to gather May dew
Before the world is down.

The ladies of St. James's
They are so fine and fair,
You'd think a box of essences
Was broken in the air;
But Phyllida, my Phyllida!
The breath of heath and furze,
When breezes blow at morning,
Is scarce so fresh as hers.

The ladies of St. James's
They're painted to the eyes;
Their white it stays forever,
Their red it never dies;
But Phyllida, my Phyllida!
Her color comes and goes;
It trembles to a lily,
It wavers to a rose.

The ladies of St. James's
With "Mersey!" and with "Lud!"
They season all their speeches
(They come of noble blood;)
But Phyllida, my Phyllida!
Her shy and simple words
Are sweet as, after rain-drops,
The music of the birds.

The ladies of St. James's
They have their fits and freaks;
They smile on you—for seconds,
They frown on you—for weeks;
But Phyllida, my Phyllida!
Come either storm or shine,
From Shrove-tide unto Shrove-tide
Is always true—and Mine.

My Phyllida! my Phyllida!
I care not though they heap
The hearts of all St. James's,
And give me all to keep;
I care not whose the beauties
Of all the world may be,
For Phyllida—for Phyllida
Is all the world to me!
—Austin Dobson in Harper's for January.

Phosphorescence.

Behind the swiftly moving ship strange light
Floats on the waves and dances in the spray;
Brighter than moon and whiter than the day,
Its myriad points leap dazzling to the sight,
And make the whole sea fair in darkest night.
No science yet has fathomed, or can say,
Where lies the shining secret of its ray,
Or at what hour the water will be bright.
Such moments and such mystic lights there are
In human lives. The days' deep currents flow
Miraculously calm, and all things glow
With radiance borrowed from no sun or star.
'Twixt golden past and present lies no bar;
The future, golden, draweth near too slow.

H. H. in Overland for January.

The Last Meeting of Pocahontas and the Great Captain.

(A. N. 1616.)

In a stately hall at Brentford, when the English June was green,
Sat the Indian Princess, summoned that her graces might be seen,
For the rumor of her beauty filled the ear of court and Queen.

There for audience as she waited, with half-scornful, silent air,
All undazzled by the splendor gleaming round her everywhere,
Dight in hroidered hose and doublet, came a courtier down the stair.

As with striding step he hasted, burdened with the Queen's command,
Loud he cried, in tones that tingled, "Welcome, welcome to my land!"
But a tremor seized the Princess, and she drooped upon her hand.

"What! no word, my Pocahontas? Must I come on hended knee?
I were slain within the forest, I were dead beyond the sea,
On the banks of wild Pamunkey I had perished, but for thee.

"Ah, I keep a heart right royal, that can never more forget.
I can hear the rush, the breathing; I can see the eyelids wet;
I can feel the sudden tightening of thine arms about me yet.

"Nay, look up. Thy father's daughter never feared the face of man, Shrank not from the forest darkness when her doe-like footsteps ran
To my cabin, bringing tidings of the craft of Powhatan."

With extended arms, entreating, stood the stalwart Captain there,
While the courtiers press around her, and the passing pages stare;
But no sign gave Pocahontas underneath her veil of hair.

All her lithe and willowy figure quivered like an aspen leaf,
And she crouched as if she shivered, frost-touched by some sudden grief.

Turning only on her husband, Rolfe, one glance, sharp, searching, brief.

At the Captain's haughty gesture back the curious courtiers fell,
And with soothest word and accent he besought that she would tell
Why she turned away, nor greeted him whom she had served so well.

But for two long hours the Princess dumbly sat and howed her head, Moveless as the statue near her. When at last she spake, she said:
"White man's tongue is false. It told me—told me—that my brave was dead."

"And I lay upon my deer-skins all one moon of falling leaves (Who hath care for song or corn dance when the voice within her grieves?)
Looking westward where the souls go, up the path the sunset weaves.

"Call me 'child' now. It is over. On my husband's arm I lean.
Never shadow, Nenemosa, our twin hearts shall come between.
Take my hand, and let us follow the great Captain to his Queen."

—Margaret Preston in Harper's for January.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Oscar Wilde's brother wishes to come to America to lecture. He is an æsthetic poet, too.

Johann Strauss is at Paris, pending the divorce suit which Frau Strauss is bringing against him at Vienna.

Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe's Florida orange groves yield her a profit, it is said, of one thousand five hundred dollars a year.

The new Spanish Infanta will be called Isabella, and will have only four Christian names, although Spanish princesses usually have a dozen or more.

Miss Calhoun, the California actress, has been engaged by the Bancrofts for the Haymarket Theatre, London, and she will play Esther Eccles in "Caste."

Dr. Schliemann has recently finished the erection of a residence in Athens which has cost more than one hundred thousand dollars, where he and his family now live.

There is only one Freemason in the French Cabinet, but such prominent statesmen as Gambetta, Brisson, Cazat, Jules Ferry, Paul Bert, and Constans are members of the order.

There is just now a revival of the report that General Lew Wallace, United States Minister to Turkey, intends to accept a prominent position in the military service of the Sultan.

Mr. P. T. Barnum, of the original and "only greatest show on earth," recently celebrated the semi-centennial anniversary of his release from the common jail in Danbury, Conn., where he had been for sixty days imprisoned for an alleged libel published in his paper, the Herald of Freedom.

The Hon. Lionel Sackville West, British Minister to the United States, went to Maryland the other day to fish in the placid waters of that State. He caught a few fish, but was in turn caught and arrested by an unsympathetic officer, for violating the fish laws of the State. He was, however, immediately released by order of the State Department.

A list of the "first-nighters" at the recent revival of Victor Hugo's "Le Roi s'Amuse," in Paris, would include about all the best known names in French politics, art, and literature. Among them were President Grévy, the Duc d'Aumale, General Gallifet, Gambetta, Brisson, Rochefort, Ferry, Simon, Gérôme, Gounod, Daudet, Déroulède, Zola, Hous-saye, Mendès, and Coppée. The veteran Camille Doucet was there, too, being admitted on a ticket he had bought fifty years before, and kept as a curiosity.

"I met Oscar Wilde in London once," said Madame Christine Nilsson-Rouzeau the other day, "where we were both guests, and he was to take me down to dinner. He commenced to talk his nonsense and pose to me as we were going to the dining-room. I said to him: 'Look here, Mr. Wilde, I will put up with no such stuff. This is all put on, and there is nothing in it but nonsense.' Mr. Wilde said: 'Thank you. You are the first sensible woman and true friend that I've met.' After that he acted as a man should, and talked sensibly."

A correspondent of the Boston Transcript suggests, as there are many people who do not care to see Mrs. Langtry disguised as an actress, but who would like to see the famous beauty of London society, and as her object and that of her managers are the same—to make money—that she hold a reception in some hall, theatre, or hotel, under her theatrical management, at first-class theatrical prices, and that she wear no paint or powder, and simply such an evening dress as she wore in the drawing-rooms of London. That would be doing business in a straightforward manner, without disguises.

Whittier declines to be the social lion that Boston society would like to make him. He will seldom accept an invitation to tea or dinner unless he is convinced that the purpose is not to make a show of him. "I heard a lady invite him the other night," says Nora Perry, "and she assured him that he would meet nobody but the family. The old poet had grown wary; he had seen these families stretch themselves indefinitely too often, and, shaking his head, he remarked: 'I do not take tea easily.' He had a moment before told me of accepting an invitation to 'see some acquaintances,' and when he arrived it was to find himself the centre of a crowd."

A man who has attended his own execution, and survives to relate the details, is worthy of a short paragraph. According to the London Echo his name is Colonel Marteras, and in 1869 he was on the point of being proclaimed President of Uruguay, when he was arrested and condemned to death. On Monday, June 30, of that year, (to be precise,) he was taken by a platoon of soldiers out of the city to a meadow in the heart of a forest, and bound to a chair. At the word "Fire!" a "spasmodic shock" threw him to the ground; he did not hear the volley; the soldiers marched away without giving him the customary coup de grâce; and Marteras by the kindly aid of a neighboring laborer got away, was healed of his wounds, and to-day serves society more humbly, but yet more safely, as waiter in a Paris café.

In Cuba it is one of the duties of the alcalde, or justice of the peace, to superintend dramatic performances and other public entertainments, and to punish the performers, if in his judgment they deserve it. Not long since a little traveling dramatic troupe, of the order known in the United States as "barn-stormers," played "The Gordian Knot" in one of the small country towns, and played it very badly, in consequence of their imperfect knowledge of their parts, which compelled the prompter's voice to be heard continually. The alcalde, who was present, was much disgusted. At the end of the performance the leading man of the company, according to custom, advanced to the footlights, and announced: "and gentlemen, to-morrow we will have the honor of appearing before this illustrious public 'The Philosophie Knowing It.'" "Stop!" shouted the alcalde, furious, "have this evening presented 'The Knot,' without it, and if to-morrow you don't know 'The Philosophie' you that you shall all go to jail."

SOCIETY.

The McLaughlin Reception.

One of the most delightful, as well as one of the most brilliant, society events that ever took place in this city, or anywhere, probably, was the reception given by Mr. and Mrs. Charles McLaughlin to their friends at the Palace on Thursday evening, the twenty first instant. No pains had been spared in perfecting plans for a splendid entertainment. The parlors of the Palace and the entire court of the parlor floor had been covered with snow-white canvas and decorated with cut flowers and evergreens. Besides the large string band inside the parlors, which provided dancing-music, a brass band was placed at the western end of the court on the second floor, which played choice selections from nine o'clock until nearly twelve. The grand court was illuminated from roof to pavement, and presented a magnificent scene. The supper was simply a matchless piece of gastronomic art that we never expect to see equalled, if equalled. Guests commenced to arrive shortly after nine o'clock, and were received by Mr. and Mrs. McLaughlin, assisted by two very pretty and agreeable young ladies, Miss Ives, and Miss Rebecca McMullin. No more thoroughly pleasant and cordial reception could be given than that of Mr. and Mrs. McLaughlin and their two stylish and amiable assistants. Dancing commenced at ten o'clock, the music being by Ballenger and his full band, and was kept up until three. There were about five hundred persons present.

The following are some of the costumes:

Mrs. McLaughlin had on a marvel from Worth, which we can not describe—a brocade satin, with embroidered velvet panels, and front of duchesse lace.

Miss Ives, a brunette, was in pink, and Miss McMullin was in blue. Mrs. Henry S. Crocker wore a dark blue velvet trimmed with pearls and duchesse point; train a la princesse; diamond ornaments.

Mrs. Kohl, of San Mateo, had on a black velvet, trimmed with jet; en train; diamond ornaments.

Mrs. N. T. Smith, a costume of scarlet satin trimmed with brocade velvet; en train; diamond ornaments.

Mrs. Rutherford looked very beautiful in a blue satin princess dress, point lace front and blue brocade satin back, and cardinal sash; around her neck she wore a cardinal collar with a solitary diamond.

Mrs. Jewett had on an attractive costume of white crepe and drapery of illusion; garniture of roses and diamond ornaments.

Mrs. Schmiedell had on a remarkably handsome imported costume, princess train, trimmed with lace and sprays of pink and scarlet geraniums; ornaments, solitaire diamond ear-drops and diamond necklace.

Mrs. Main wore a Paris dress of garnet velvet, en train, and corn-colored satin overdress richly embroidered; she wore an immense butterfly of diamonds in her hair, large solitaire diamond ear-drops, and other diamond ornaments.

Mrs. MacDermott also had on a Paris dress of white satin, en train, and front of matchless embroidery; diamond ornaments.

Mrs. Breeze, in black satin, en train, trimmed with Chantilly lace; diamond ornaments.

Miss Kohl, of San Mateo, in a short costume of blue satin.

Miss Bradley, in a short costume of pink striped silk, baby waist.

Miss Crane, of Oakland, in a very pretty dress of combination colors, en train; garniture of cloth of gold and sylphide roses.

Mrs. Irving Scott, in claret-colored velvet and pink satin, en train; diamond ornaments.

Mrs. Henry L. Dodge, in a mauve satin, en train, richly and elaborately trimmed with duchesse lace; diamond ornaments.

Miss Dodge, in a short costume of cream-colored satin.

Mrs. Scott Wilson, in an elegant costume of blue satin, profusely trimmed with lace and flowers; diamond ornaments.

Mrs. Grant, in black velvet, en train, trimmed with jet passamenterie; diamond ornaments.

Mrs. McMullin, in a crimson velvet, court train; diamond ornaments.

Mrs. Goad, in blue brocade satin, trimmed with cardinal satin and lace; diamond ornaments.

Mrs. Herman, in a short costume of black velvet; diamond ornaments.

Miss Hager, in a short costume of pink satin.

Mrs. Newton, in a scarlet satin, Chantilly lace flounces; en train; diamond ornaments.

Miss Hastings, in crimson satin and drapery of pink crepe embroidered in colors; en train.

Miss Torbert, in a short costume of pink satin and crepe; garniture of marguerites.

Miss Holladay, in a short costume of white crepe; garniture of lilacs.

Miss Ruth Holladay, in a short costume of pink satin and crepe; Mrs. Sullivan, in crimson velvet, princess train; petticoat of embossed velvet; diamond ornaments.

Miss Burling, in a short costume of blue satin; ornaments, pearl ear-drops and necklace of pearls.

Mrs. Tewksbury, in ruby velvet, court train; ornaments, diamond ear-drops and crescent of diamonds.

Mrs. Swift, in cane au lait satin en train; ornaments, diamonds.

Mrs. Pixley, in black velvet and point appliqué lace; diamond ornaments.

Miss Van Reynegom, in pink crepe and satin.

Mrs. Stanwood, in black velvet, en train; diamond ornaments.

Mrs. Wetherbee, in corn-colored satin, trimmed with roses and cardinal ribbon bows; diamond ornaments.

Mrs. Sonntag, in a magnificent costume of rosebud pink plush, train a la princesse; diamond ornaments.

Mrs. Fry in a marvelously fitting and attractive dress of gold and canary-colored satin, trimmed with lace; diamond ornaments.

Mrs. Henry Scott, in a costume of cardinal satin and brocade petticoat, en train; diamond ornaments.

Miss Wood, in an exceedingly pretty and elaborate costume of white satin; she wore a handsome ornament in her hair, and carried a bouquet of roses.

Mrs. Ross, in a costume of pink satin, en train.

Mrs. Miller, in black velvet train, a la princesse.

Miss Miller, in an elegant brocade white satin.

Mrs. Mizner, of Benicia, in black silk en train; diamond ornaments.

Miss Mizner, in a short costume of white.

Miss Sedgwick, in blue brocade satin.

Mrs. Castle, in a remarkably handsome white satin and embroidered train; diamond ornaments.

Mrs. Kinzey, in a cardinal satin and superbly embroidered petticoat; en train; diamond ornaments.

Madame Berton, in a lovely suit of pale pink plush, en train; diamond ornaments.

Mrs. Sharon, in a very handsome and perfectly-fitting dress of rosebud pink watered satin, en train.

Miss Rice, in a pretty costume of figured silk.

Mrs. Stoneman, in blue satin elaborately trimmed with Chantilly lace and cardinal, en train; diamond ornaments.

Mrs. Poett, in blue satin and lace.

Mrs. Thorn, in a very pretty costume of Ottoman silk, and lace overdress; diamond ornaments.

Mrs. Melone, in a handsome Paris dress, en train; diamond ornaments.

Miss Hawkins, in pale blue satin, trimmed with duchesse point.

Mrs. Spaulding, in black velvet, en train; corsage cut square.

Miss Donahue, in a canary-colored brocade satin, trimmed with lace.

Mrs. Dean, in a lovely costume of white brocade satin, en train; ber ornaments were solitaire diamond ear-drops, diamond necklace, and bracelets.

Mrs. Shaw, in a white brocade satin, en train; diamond ornaments.

Miss Tot Cutter, in a white satin, en train.

Mrs. Loomis, in a black velvet, en train.

Miss Felton, in a costume of pink satin.

Miss Johnson, in a lavender satin, en train.

Miss Trowbridge, Miss Peters, and, in fact, all of the young girls present, were in pretty suits.

Mrs. McNulty, in a black satin, en train.

Chapman, in a black brocade satin, en train.

Gilson, in a cream-colored brocade satin, which was much observed.

Mrs. Doctor Whitney, in a white satin elegantly trimmed,

The following named ladies and gentlemen were present: Colonel and Mrs. Sutherland, Mr. and Mrs. C. Mayne, Mr. and Mrs. W. E. Dean, Mr. and Mrs. C. H. Hooker, Mr. Osgood Hooker, Miss Hooker, Mrs. John McMullin, Mr. and Mrs. J. C. Torbert, Miss Torbert, Dr. and Mrs. Whitney, Governor and Mrs. Stoneman, Judge and Mrs. McKinstry, Miss McKinstry, Senator Sharon, Mr. and Mrs. A. D. Sharon, Mr. and Mrs. Horace Davis, Messrs. Schofield, Mr. and Mrs. P. Donahue, Colonel and Mrs. Andrews, Miss Andrews, Mr. and Mrs. John H. Jewett, Mr. and Mrs. Adams, Lieutenant and Mrs. Van Ness, Major and Mrs. Breckenridge, General and Mrs. Kautz, Mrs. Vanderwater, Mr. and Mrs. S. M. Wilson, Messrs. Wilson, Mr. and Mrs. Russell Wilson, Frank Wilson, Mr. and Mrs. Schmiedell, Miss Peters, Colonel and Mrs. Sullivan, Miss Sullivan, Judge and Mrs. Hager, Judge and Mrs. Ross, Captain and Mrs. Maddox, Miss Moore, Judge and Mrs. Wallace, the Misses Wallace, Mr. and Mrs. S. Moore, Dr. and Mrs. Bowie, Miss Bowie, Mr. and Mrs. J. Robinson, Mr. and Mrs. Blanding, Commodore and Mrs. Phelps, Dr. Harkness, Mr. and Mrs. Barollett, Mr. and Mrs. C. F. Crocker, Mr. and Mrs. H. S. Scott, Mr. and Mrs. Theodore Payne, Mr. and Mrs. N. G. Kittle, Miss Kittle, Mr. and Mrs. Sedgwick, Miss Sedgwick, Mr. and Mrs. Goad, Mr. and Mrs. Boardman, Miss Burling, Mr. and Mrs. Loomis, Miss Felton, Judge and Mrs. Wheeler, Mrs. Hamilton Smith, Miss Smith, Mr. and Mrs. Drury Melone, Mr. and Mrs. Truman, Miss Hawkins, Mrs. Hastings, Miss Hastings, Mr. and Mrs. Keyes, Miss L. Hastings, Mr. and Mrs. Withington, Mr. and Mrs. N. T. Smith, Miss Dearborn, Mr. and Mrs. S. B. Roswell, Miss E. Roswell, Mrs. Colonel Catherwood, Mr. and Mrs. A. L. Tubbs, Judge and Mrs. Brooks, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Sonntag, Miss Garber, Miss Wade, Mr. and Mrs. C. N. Shaw, Miss Rice, Mr. and Mrs. Kohl, Miss Crane, Mr. and Mrs. C. Wetherbee, Mr. and Mrs. McDermott, Mr. and Mrs. Herman, Mr. and Mrs. Jayne, Mr. and Mrs. Frank M. Pixley, Miss Van Reynegom, Miss Trowbridge, Miss Marshall, Mr. and Mrs. Edward Marshall, Mrs. Cutler, the Misses Cutler, S. L. Robinson, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Austin, General Houghton, Mr. and Mrs. Reis, H. S. and Mrs. Crocker, Miss Nannie Crane, T. K. Breeze, S. D. Mayer, Mr. and Mrs. Kinzey, Madame Berton, Mrs. Poett, Mamie Donohue, Mark McDonald, Mr. and Mrs. Reque, Governor and Mrs. Johnson, Captain Mix, Judge and Mrs. Currie, Mrs. Laton, Doctor and Mrs. Burgess, Mrs. E. B. Crocker, Miss Crocker, Colonel and Mrs. J. D. Fry, Mr. and Mrs. N. P. Jones, Miss Jones, the Misses Adams, Miss Annie Prince, Mr. and Mrs. F. Brown, Miss Aldrich, Mr. and Mrs. J. S. Wilson, Mr. and Mrs. W. Brown, Miss Aldrich, W. E. Brown, Mr. Tate, the Misses Durbrow, Messrs. Durbrow, Mr. and Mrs. Bradley, Miss Bradley, Judge and Mrs. Mizner, Miss Mizner, Mr. and Mrs. W. Norris, Doctor and Mrs. Toland, Mrs. Y. Breeze, Misses Masten, Mr. and Mrs. Harrington, Judge and Mrs. Morrison, Mr. and Mrs. H. Newton, Mr. and Mrs. Colby, Miss Fannie Fargo, Miss Fargo, Mr. and Mrs. H. L. Dodge, Miss Dodge, Mr. and Mrs. Forbes, the Messrs. Forbes, Mr. and Mrs. W. Ward, Mr. and Mrs. H. L. Hall, Mr. and Mrs. Brumagim, Misses Brumagim, Mr. and Mrs. Vavert de Mean, Mr. and Mrs. D. W. Earl, Mr. and Mrs. Carolan, Mr. and Mrs. Pauli, Miss Wildman, Major and Mrs. Langer, General and Mrs. Barnes, Mr. and Mrs. Miller, Miss Miller, Lieutenant and Mrs. Campbell, Mr. and Mrs. M. Castle, Mr. and Mrs. Godley, Miss Godley, Dr. and Mrs. McNulty, Mr. and Mrs. Hyde, Mr. and Mrs. Stanwood, Mr. and Mrs. Adam Grant, Miss Hammond, Charles Crocker, Mr. Spofford, General Butterfield, Lieutenant Hein, Mr. Schofield, Mr. David, Colonel Stone, Lieutenant Maison, Judge Sawyer, L. Mizner, C. Kenney, C. Coleman, F. Carolan, L. W. Mix, C. Pelden, E. Wheeler, Henry McDowell, Fred Sharon, R. H. Pease, Frank Washington, Jerome Hart, Messrs. Woods, Wetherell, Hooper, Rhodes, Borden, R. Morrow, C. Swift, W. S. Jones, William Dewey, E. Greenway, E. Scott, C. Weller, Lieutenant Hubbert, Lieutenant Prince, Lieutenant Burley, C. A. Burley, Richard Pierce, H. G. Platt, Guy Shirley, Messrs. Mott, Platt, Wallace, Redington, Gilmore, Swift, Sheldon, Page, Natop, Beal, Goddiffe, Woods, Wetherell, Hopper, Rhodes, Borden, Kingsbury, Miller, Parker, Osgood, Lewis, Hall, Tubbs, Kewen, Boyd, Mayne, Newell, Burling, Keane, St. John, Bowie, Dennison, Fisher.

The Last Nilsson Concerts.

The closing Nilsson concert on Monday evening drew out even a larger audience than that of the first evening, which itself seemed to be an aggregation of all the fashionable people of our city, and a good deal larger but less brilliant and less dressy audience than that of the second concert on Thursday evening of last week, which was the most noticeably beautiful of any of the gatherings. On this occasion, in particular, the toilettes of the ladies were exceedingly elaborate and showy, while a liberal display of pink and white mantles and opera-cloaks imparted a diversified charm to the animated scene. Much to the satisfaction of all who did not occupy front seats, the fair sex generally wore the capote, which is the prevailing evening head-gear in Eastern cities at present, or else some petite conceit in pink, white, or crushed-strawberry plush—at any rate there were not more than a dozen pokes or bats in the lower part of the house, and less in the dress-circle. It was a gorgeous sight—the auditorium of the Grand Opera House—on Thursday night, and was surely the grandest display of the reigning wealth, beauty, and refinement of San Francisco that has ever been presented in our city. There was not a very perceptible change of costume or position of occupants at the first two concerts. The matinée, however, was a complete transformation, especially in the body of the house; and it was plain to behold that many of the occupants of seats were not habitués—that the holders of season-tickets had given their seats to friends or dependents. Even the boxes, except Mr. Fair's and Mr. Dunphy's, were turned over to less aristocratic auditors. Monday evening, as we have heretofore intimated, was a crush; and the spectators of the first two evenings, as a general thing, were to be seen in their accustomed seats, with some marked exceptions: for instance, the box which contained Mrs. Robinson and other notably pretty ladies must have been turned over to a delegation from Milpitas; the manager's box must have contained a committee from the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, and so on. The box formerly occupied by the princess was occupied by Governor-elect and Mrs. Stoneman and party. Mrs. Stoneman was dressed in a white satin, and wore a white capote. Mrs. Charles Sontag had on a cardinal and black satin, and was without bonnet. Mrs. James G. Fair had on a light brocade, and wore a pink bonnet; her daughter was in blue. Miss Jennie Dunphy had on a black brocade satin, cut square in the neck, and trimmed with Chantilly lace; she wore a black capote. Mrs. Dunphy Jr., wore a costume of blue silk and white hat. Miss Jennie Flood had on a marvelously showy costume of satin. One of the most conspicuous persons in the house was Mrs. Goad, who looked very queenly in the centre of the dress-circle in an exceedingly brilliant costume, and hair dressed a la mode. The programme was not so satisfactory as any of the previous ones. Still, the selections given were generally acceptable.

Notes and Gossip.

Mrs. Charles F. Crocker and Mrs. Easton, who have been enjoying the delightful climate at Monterey for a week or two, have returned. Mrs. Robert N. Graves and Miss Graves and maid, who have been at the Hotel del Monte for a month or more, have returned to the Palace. Captain George H. Burton, U. S. A., (who has a leave of absence for several months,) and Mrs. Burton and her children, are spending the winter in Los Angeles. Colonel and Mrs. Creed Raymond, who have been spending quite a while in Southern California, have returned. Mr. and Mrs. Timothy Hopkins, accompanied by Mrs. Mark Hopkins, arrived here from New York on Monday last, in a special car, over the Southern route. Charles M. Plum came home by the same train on Monday last. Mr. and Mrs. Callahan and Miss Callahan returned from the East on Thursday last. A telegram announces the safe arrival of Mr. and Mrs. Hemphill in Philadelphia. Colonel Horace Fletcher, who left here on Saturday last for Japan, expects to return on or about the first of March. Mrs. E. B. Crocker and Miss Amy Crocker have returned from Monterey. Mrs. Crocker and her daughters have also returned from Monterey. General Daniel Butterfield, of New York, arrived here with Mr. Charles Crocker upon the return of the latter gentleman a few days ago. Master Charles A. Foster, U. S. N., has been at the Palace during the week. A large number of U. S. N. officers came here at the Occidental on Sunday last, among whom were Lieutenant-Commander George E. Ide, Passed-Assistant-Paymaster H. Trumbull Stancliff, Passed-Assistant-Surgeon Richard A. Urquhart, Paymaster Daniel A. Smith, of the Alaska, Philip Cooke and Charlie Bogan, Lieutenant Carl F. Palfrey, of the Engineer Corps, U. S. A., was also at the Occidental on Sunday last. Miss Daisy Van Voorbees, who has been visiting in Los Angeles with her father, has returned to Sacramento. Miss Lizzie Sinton departs for Sacramento immediately after the holidays, on a visit to her friend Miss Susie Russell, who was the acknowledged belle of an elegant party given at the Palace lately. Mr. and Mrs. Blitz Paxton, who have been for some time contemplating an Eastern trip, left here for Rochester, N. Y., on Sunday last. Mr. Edgar Mills and his very attractive daughter went by the same train. Consul and Madame De Mean go to Monterey this afternoon, to remain until Tuesday, the second proximo. Miss Mary Miller, who arrived here from New York on Friday, the fifteenth instant, and occupied a mezzanine box at the third Nilsson concert the day following, looked extremely bewitching in a blue velvet costume, and was the object of many a lorgnette by admiring friends. Miss Jennie McFarland, of Sacramento, has gone to Los Angeles to remain until after the holidays. Mrs. Thomas Grant and her two daughters leave for Europe in a day or two, to remain abroad a year or more. Commander Frederick Pearson, U. S. N., who left here on the fourteenth instant on a short leave, has arrived in Washington; the statement that Commander Pearson is about to enter into an engagement must be politely contradicted. Rear-Admiral Balch, whose retirement we noted in a former issue, will be joined at Panama by Mrs. Balch and family, who left here on the fifteenth instant, and the whole party will proceed Atlanticward from that point. Mr. and Mrs. W. B. Collier, of Van Ness Avenue, but at present in St. Louis, will leave that city in a few days for home. General and Mrs. Banning, of Los Angeles, have been at the Occidental since Saturday last. Surgeon James C. McKee, U. S. A., returned to this city by the southern route on Sunday last. Mr. and Mrs. Millen Griffith and the Misses Griffith have been at Monterey during the past week. Miss Slade has returned from Monterey. Mrs. George H. Kimball, of the Grand left here yesterday for Los Angeles to enjoy holiday festivities with her mother and sisters. Mrs. General W. S. Hancock has written a "Te Deum Laudamus," which is shortly to be published; Mrs. Hancock is remembered by all Los Angeles people of twenty odd years ago as not only a charming musician and composer while a resident of that place, but as a lady of irresistibly winning and delightful ways. Mr. and Mrs. W. S. Chapman, whose daughter was married to the youngest son of General Grant, just two years ago, at the Palace Hotel, are expecting a visit from the happy couple whose matrimonial engagement was the result of mutual admiration at first sight in the dining-room of the Palace and subsequent declarations of love at a noted pleasure resort in Sonoma county. The Miss Jennie Chamberlain, the beautiful American girl (of Cleveland) who is at present creating a sensation in England, was in this city four years ago, and with her father and mother and sister spent the winter at the Palace; she was generally regarded by the Palace people as a very pretty girl; she is tall and a blonde. Miss Hammond has returned from Monterey. Sir James McCulloch and Lady McCulloch, of Australia, have been spending a few days at Monterey. Colonel Bernard, U. S. A., and family, who left here a few days ago, are in Los Angeles. W. H. King, U. S. N., and C. P. Eakin, U. S. A., are at the Occidental. Mr. and Mrs. S. S. Wright went to Monterey on Saturday last. Mrs. Lieutenant-Commander Buford has postponed her departure for the East until after the holidays. Miss Emma Irwin, daughter of ex-Governor Irwin, is visiting friends in this city. Hon. S. O. Houghton, of San José, is spending a few days at Monterey. Mrs. Colgate Baker gave a delightful dancing party at her residence on Van Ness Avenue on Monday evening last. Mrs. J. Mora Moss will arrive here from the East to-day. Miss Hubbard and Miss Hastings returned from Monterey on Monday last. A Washington correspondent of the New York World says that "Senator Fair and his family will return to Washington after New Year's, and then the Monte Christo banquets of the bonanza king will again dazzle his winter guests." Another correspondent, in his statement that Senator and Mrs. Fair had secured apartments at the Arlington, pays a high compliment to Mrs. Fair, and concludes: "And her jewels will rival the stars in their brilliancy. To the regret of the younger belles, Senator Fair's oldest son and namesake will not come East, preferring to remain in the glorious climate of California for the short season of his parents' absence." General J. F. Houghton, of Oakland, whose family are in Europe at present, has taken up his residence for the winter at the Palace. The Governor-elect and Mrs. Stoneman have been at the Palace since Saturday last; on the Monday following, which is the weekly reception day at the Palace, Mrs. Stoneman received a large number of ladies; in the evening she attended the Nilsson concert, accompanied by General Stoneman and a number of friends. Cards are out for a party to be given by Mr. and Mrs. G. Frank Smith, of Oakland, on Thursday, January 4, 1883. The invitations say: "8:30 P. M.—Dancing." The Princess and the Marquis of Lorne and party are still at the Hotel del Monte, where they went on Friday, the fifteenth instant, intending to tarry but a day or two; but the Princess has taken a great liking to old Monterey and the Carmel Church, Cypress Point, and other places of interest in the vicinity of her hotel, and may not leave there for several weeks. Major Pitcher, U. S. A., and family, arrived here from the East on Thursday last. Trenor W. Park, who, it will be remembered, married the eldest daughter of A. C. Nichols, of this city, seven or eight months ago, died in New York on Wednesday. The Misses Beaver and Master W. F. Wood will arrive Sunday, after a twelve-month's tour of Europe and the Eastern States.

Weddings and Engagements.

Miss Minnie Glassell, granddaughter of the late Doctor Toland, a very pretty and accomplished young lady of Los Angeles, but well known among San Francisco society people, was married at the former place on the thirteenth instant, to Mr. Harrington Brown, of the same city. Mr. Brown and his two brothers, some time ago, in their search after an accidental home, in company with their mother, a very delightful lady from the sunny South, settled in Los Angeles. And they soon settled the question of "none but the brave deserve the fair" in that neighborhood, and made quick work of unsettling the minds of three less ardent or less skillful Romeos than themselves; for they respectively laid siege to and won the hearts of the pretty and petite daughter of an ex-Confederate general, the pretty and not petite daughter of an ex-United States Senator, and the daughter of Judge Glassell, whose marriage we have just announced—which is good for the Browns. On the same day in Los Angeles, Mr. Fred W. Wood, a prosperous young gentleman of that city, and Miss Leona Figné-Dupuytren, formerly of this city, were married. At the residence of the bride's father, in this city, on Friday evening, the twenty-second instant, Miss Ira Ellis, daughter of Captain H. H. Ellis was married to Dr. W. E. Ledyard. On Wednesday evening next, the twenty-seventh instant, Miss Ivy Wandesford, daughter of Mr. J. B. Wandesford, will be married to Mr. H. M. Kersey, of Oregon, at the residence of Miss W.'s parents in Oakland. A reception will follow the ceremony, and the happy couple will shortly afterward leave for Portland.

The late Charles Darwin, Professor Blackie, Doctor Carpenter, and Messrs. E. A. Freeman, Anthony Trollope, Wilkie Collins, etc., have all written letters in response to a series of questions touching their practice in the matter of alcohol and tobacco. They are shortly to be published in a small volume, under the title of "Study and Stimulants." It will doubtless be exceedingly interesting reading to men of letters and science.

Monsieur Auguste Vitu, the dramatic critic of the Figaro, publishes an interesting theatrical study, "La Maison Mortuaire de Molière" (Paris: Lemerre). He gives a complete history of the houses in the neighborhood of the Rue Richelieu and the Palais Royal which were in any way connected with the career of the great playwright. Another theatrical work is "Les Premières Illustrées," by Raoul Tsché, (Paris: Monnier,) in which the author describes the audiences who greeted the successes of the past year or two, such as "Odette," "Serge Panine," "Les Rantzau," "Madame le Diable," "Le Jour et la Nuit," and many others. He also gives the gossip that attended their production. Monsieur Henri Melhac furnishes a rhymed preface.

FROM MANHATTAN ISLAND.

The Parties and Plays which are now Agitating New York Society.

The social season is on its feet at last, and in a fair way to boom from now until coaching day, next spring. The decisive start was made Monday, when the F. C. D. C. gave its first ball since the last season. Sneers and derogatory remarks have been leveled at the F. C. D. C., and its downfall predicted many times. Its bitter rival, the "Small and Early," has waged a fierce war against it, and it has been accused of allowing "common" people to attend its balls. Mr. Ward McAllister, the father and protector of the organization, has been accused boldly of allowing it to run down, and its oldest patrons spoke of it complainingly. In point of fact, its future did look shaky a little while ago, but it has overcome all its enemies, backed its rival to the wall, and regained its imperiled position with one grand success. The ball was one of the most brilliant the city has seen.

Mr. McAllister has exerted himself as he did when the class first began, and sent the invitations with the utmost care. He secured the cooperation and attendance of such people as Lord Douglass Gordon, Lord and Lady Mandeville, Count and Countess de Cairy, Baron Blichroeder, Attorney General and Mrs. Brewster, Governor Carroll and wife, Royal Phelps, Colonel Delancy Kane, Mr. and Mrs. Pierre Lorillard, the Astors, the Stuyvesants, and more than a hundred more of the best society people. Of course, this settled the matter, and the ball was a success. There were three hundred guests, including no less than thirty débutantes. That was a good many girls to make their first bow to society at once. Of course, they all bowed gracefully and smiled sweetly. They were invariably dressed in white, danced incessantly, and were flushed and brilliant-looking throughout the whole evening, going home in a flutter of delight. They are all insanely happy, and firmly convinced that society is more beautiful even than their dreams. They will change their minds within six months. There will be few balls in the future that will be more attractive in themselves than the F. C. D. C. for 1882, and all social affairs will decrease in attractiveness as the débutantes of Monday grow older with the season. Still they had a happy time Monday night, and smiled sweetly upon the indefatigable Mr. McAllister, who was in a paroxysm of delight and gratification at the success of his pet society. He never mentioned the words "Small and Early," but overflowed with human kindness all the evening. Delmonico's rooms had been specially decorated for the affair, and the dreadful crash dancing-cloth abolished. If the enthusiasm can be sustained, and the membership kept pure, the F. C. D. C. will go on in its course as successfully as before.

I have a profound regard for honest criticism—though, on the whole, I prefer to read clever and brilliant criticism. Then, lest I should be impressed by the brilliant criticism, I have decided not to believe any criticism. This leaves me free to regard truth and admire brilliancy without having any opinions. When "Iolanthe," Gilbert and Sullivan's new opera, was produced at the Standard Theatre I was at a dinner-party. The following day I read all the papers, and came to the conclusion that the latest production of the famous Englishmen was a grand success. Accordingly I went the next evening. On the way I met a man whom I knew to be a level-headed man, and he yelled:

"Ullo! where you goin'?"

"To see 'Iolanthe.'"

"Haven't you seen it?"

"No; or else I would not be on my way there to-night. Have you been?"

"Yes; went first night. May be a good thing, but I failed to see it. After I had seen 'Pinafore,' 'Penzance,' and 'Patience,' I came away with three or four rattling good tunes running in my head and a feeling of refreshment after a good deal of laughing. When I came away from 'Iolanthe,' I couldn't remember a solitary darn strain, and was conscious that I hadn't laughed once."

The remarks of this level-headed man passed out of my mind until I had seen the new opera, when they returned in extraordinary force. The man's judgment was indubitably correct. "Iolanthe" is the least attractive of the later works of Gilbert and Sullivan. There are no two cleverer men in the way of light-opera writers alive to-day than the authors of "Pinafore," but they have slipped up this time without a shadow of doubt. The new opera is the result of nearly a year's labor by two men who sail in their own magnificent yachts while writing, and have all the advantages accruing from large wealth. Their conditions could not have been more perfect than they were when "Iolanthe" was written; everybody looked forward to the master-piece of comic-opera writing. Gilbert and Sullivan have worked the same old themes over again, both in music and libretto, that they began on in "Pinafore." The grotesque idea of the first of the famous "P's" was reshaped in "Penzance," and again in "Patience." When the last-named opera came out, people murmured somewhat, but were delighted with the clean and bright lines and the tuneful melodies. The satire, too, was easy for even the least cultured to understand. Now the fourth of the series takes up the same grotesque idea that formed the basis for the other operas, and points it with an alleged satire on the House of Lords. There is little interest among Americans for that renowned British institution, and little wit in its treatment by Mr. Gilbert. This time they should have given us something new. The interminable drumming on one string is becoming monotonous. When we saw the Captain and Ralph Rackstraw calmly change places, heard the way the twins were mixed up, and listened to the cold truths of the Admiral, in "Pinafore," we laughed. The idea of acting grotesque situations with perfect gravity was irresistibly funny. In "Iolanthe" the same thing is less artistically worked up, besides lacking the charm of novelty. The music will not live, and there are too many choruses and too few solos. "Iolanthe" is not a success. I am aware that nearly all the critics say that it is, and that I shall be considered an ass for calling it otherwise. I do not "weaken," however, but advance a single opinion—that of a man who has been all his life in New York and visited the theatres continually.

The Herald affords me vast amusement. Its errors are funnier than half the humorous articles in the Western pa- pers, and its owlish wisdom overpowering. But it is when it attempts to "crib" and conceal the fact that it becomes most interesting. Not long ago a musical paper of this city told a story about Miss Emma Abbott, the alleged prima donna. Miss Abbott's weakness for introducing familiar airs into staid and venerable Italian operas is well known. Recently she sang "The Old Folks at Home" in the middle of the mad scene of "Lucia." The bass fiddle had a Chinese fit, the snare-drum fainted, and the conductor arose and swore that it would make poor old Donizetti turn over in his coffin. However, he urged Miss Abbott to repeat the sacrilege, as it might have the effect of making Donizetti turn back again. The Herald read this story and was convulsed with laughter. Thereupon it said:

"Be hivins, Oi will have recourse to a wily plot, and print this same joke myself!"

The next day it appeared: but, alas! the opera had been changed from "Lucia" to "Faust," and the name of Gounod substituted for Donizetti. Therefore Miss Abbott sang the ballad in the mad scene in "Faust," and "Gounod turned over in his coffin"—Mr. Gounod being at present hale and hearty, and at his residence in London.

Did you know that Leonard Grover was going to San Francisco? Probably not, as the fact is not momentous. Still it is said here that he is to manage one of your theatres, and produce some of his own plays. He has been a successful playwright, and is a jolly sort of a man. He seems very anxious to go, but I fear it will be a mistake. He has several important plays on the stocks now, and they will never be finished if he takes a theatre on his hands. The duties of management leave small time for writing plays. Many men can manage theatres, but few can write such plays as Leonard Grover writes. They are not great, but they are amusing.

We have suffered cruelly of late from the unwonted prevalence of the English actor. He comes out in the sad and fading autumn with a dewy and pristine freshness that leaves nothing to be desired. The arrival of the Wyndom and Langtry companies let him loose in large numbers on Broadway, and he became amazingly prominent in Delmonico's. Out of one hundred English actors, at least ninety-nine become violently excited when they first visit Del's. They have heard that the place was high-priced, and hence (as they are invariably men of mournfully meagre means) they are wary and shy about giving their orders. After staring all the gentlemen in the place out of countenance, they yell at the waiter in robust tones:

"Oi soy, George! Bring me some Baws's ale, there's a good fellow—an'—oi soy—don't be long, y' know!"

After delivering himself of this, the English actor falls to staring at the ceiling through his single glass until the bottle of ale is brought to him. He looks hard at the label, gives a grunt of satisfaction, and tries the ale. It is entirely to his satisfaction, and he drinks four or five bottles, as he gazes at the throngs of beautiful women passing down Broadway. When he is ready to depart, the waiter casually passes him a check for two dollars or thereabouts, and the English actor promptly becomes partially insane and vastly indignant. His protestations and his vituperations are listened to by the trained waiters at Delmonico's with well-bred attention, and the Americans who have been stared at by him now stare at the English actor with smiles of cunning sarcasm. Eventually he pays, and stalks out with an alleged haughty carriage of the head, vowing that he will never enter the place again. The same ale in England would have cost him only a few cents, and he attributes all over that to the extortion of Charlie Delmonico. In point of fact, his favorite ale would cost him thirty-five cents a pint bottle everywhere in New York, on account of the immense import duties. Still, he doesn't know this, and lays it all to the restaurant. He may indulge in abuse of Delmonico's, but he really has the strongest possible respect for a place that is so very high-priced, and when he learns to buy cheaply, he will spend all his time there. He will probably appear in San Francisco in the course of time. You will recognize him at a glance, if he is quiet. If he is not quiet, you will hear him when he is still several blocks away, and you will reverentially step aside and wait for him to pass. Presently he will loom up with a bell-crowned beaver at a slight tilt over the left eye, and the right eye concealed by a large glass on which the light scintillates as he wags his head in the air. His hair is brushed forward over the ears, and his mustache curled at the ends. He has little side-whiskers whimsically known as "fire-escapes," and his hands are incased in brick-dust colored gloves. On his feet are heavy shoes with cork soles, and he carries a yellow stick with a hammered silver head. No other part of him is visible, for he always wears a huge Newmarket top-coat with tails that reach the ground. Above it is one of the latest collars—a vast white band, nearly two inches wide, that all but chokes the wearer, but is nevertheless awfully swell. It may be your destiny to meet the English actor. He will surprise you greatly, for in nine cases out of ten he is, despite his ridiculous make-up and aggressive airs, a thoroughly good-hearted and honest fellow. Besides, he is invariably amusing.

FLANEUR.

NEW YORK, December 14, 1882.

The following interesting paragraph is from "The New Guide of the Conversation in Portuguese and English." The author of these pleasing periods is one Dom Pedro Caroleno:

We were increasing this second edition with a phraseology, in the first part, and some familiar letters, anecdotes, idioms, proverbs, and to second a coin's index. The Works which we were conferring for this labor, found use for nothing; but those what were publishing to Portugal, or out, they were almost all composed for some foreign, or some national little acquainted in the spirit of both languages. It was resulting from that carelessness to rest these Works full of imperfections, and anomalies of style; in spite of the infinite typographical faults which sometimes invest the sense of the periods. It increase not to contain any of those Works the figured pronunciation of the english words, nor the prosodial accent in the portuguese; indispensible object whom wish to speak the english and portuguese languages correctly. We expect then, who the little book (for the care what we wrote him, and for her typographical correction) that may be worth the acceptance of the studious persons, and especially of the Youth, at which we dedicate him particularly.

Doctor G. M. Sternberg, U. S. A., has been elected a fellow of the Royal Microscopical Society. This is a marked compliment, but no more than Doctor Sternberg deserves.

OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES.

Some of his Views on the Relations between Authors and Readers.

In the January number of the Atlantic, Doctor Holmes resumes his pleasant intercourse with his readers, under the heading, "An After-breakfast Talk." He mentions the long series of articles from his pen which have appeared in that magazine, and in the course of his remarks upon them says:

An author may interest his public by his work, or by his personality, or by both. A great mathematician or metaphysician may be lost sight of in his own intellectual wealth, as a great capitalist becomes at last the mere appendage of his far more important millions. There is, on the other hand, a class of writers whose individuality is the one thing we care about. The world could get along without their help, but it wants their company. We are not so very curious about the details of the life of Gauss, but we do want to know a good deal about Richter. Poor Charles Lamb did not invent any grand formula, he certainly had not the lever of Archimedes, but he had a personality which was quite apart from that of all average humanity, and he is adopted as one of the pleasantest inmates of memory.

An author should know that the very characteristics which make him the object of admiration to many, and endear him to some among them, will render him an object of dislike to a certain number of individuals of equal, it may be of superior, intelligence. Doubtless God never made a better berry than the strawberry, yet it is a poison to a considerable number of persons. He (or she) who ventures into authorship must expect to encounter occasional instances of antipathy, of which he and all that he does are the subjects. Let him take it patiently.

There is a converse to all this, which it is much pleasanter to contemplate and to experience. Let us suppose an author to have some distinguishing quality, which shows itself in what he writes, and by which he is known from all other writers. There will be individuals—they may be few, they may be many—who will so instantly recognize, so eagerly accept, so warmly adopt, even so devoutly idolize, the writer in question that self-love itself, dulled as its palate is by the hot spices of praise, draws back overcome by the burning stimulants of adoration. I was told, not long since, by one of our justly admired authoresses, that a correspondent wrote to her that she had read one of her stories fourteen times in succession.

It should not be forgotten by the critic that every grade of mental development demands a literature of its own; a little above its level, that it may be lifted to a higher grade, but not too much above it, so that it requires too long a stride. The true critic is not the sharp capitator verborum; not the brisk epigrammatist, showing off his own cleverness, always trying to outflank the author against whom he has arrayed his wits and his learning. He is a man who knows the real wants of the reading world, and can prize at their just value the writings which meet those wants. I remember, many years ago, happening to speak, before a certain clergyman, of the great convenience I had found in having Mrs. Cowden Clarke's Concordance to the plays of Shakespeare always at hand. He spoke scornfully, naso adunco, of the poor creature who could require an index to such familiar productions. No doubt he remembered every line and every word of the distinguished author—at least, it was fair to presume so—but there are some who might not feel quite certain about every passage, and would not be ashamed to consult the volume he could dispense with. The organs of criticism swarm with just such prigs and pretenders, and the young author must be prepared to run the gauntlet through a double row of them. Happy for him if he can keep his temper, and profit by their rough handling; satisfy them he never can.

In spite of the positive verdicts of the soundest criticism, we must not forget that each individual has always his right to like or dislike, for the simple reason that he is what he is, and none other. The writer who attains a certain measure of popularity, so as to reach a considerable variety of readers, must be ready for a trial more dangerous than that of running the gauntlet just spoken of. He will be startled to find himself the object of an embarrassing devotion, and almost appropriation, by some of his parish of readers. He will blush, at his lonely desk, as he reads the extravagances of expression which pour over him like the oil which ran down upon the beard of Aaron. We ought to have his photograph as he reads one of those frequent missives, oftentimes traced, we may guess, in the delicate, slanting hand which betrays the slender fingers of the sympathetic sisterhood. A slight sense of the ridiculous at being made so much of qualifies the placid tolerance with which the rhymester or the essayist sees himself preferred to the great masters in prose and verse, and reads his name glowing in a halo of epithets which might belong to Bacon or Milton. We need not grudge him such pleasure as he may derive from the illusion of a momentary revery, in which he dreams of himself as clad in royal robes and exalted among the immortals. The next post will probably bring him some slip from a newspaper or critical journal, which will strip him of his regalia, as Thackeray, in one of his illustrations, has disrobed and denuded the Grand Monarque. To be known as a writer is to become public property. Every book a writer publishes—say, rather, every line he traces—is an open sesame as good as a latch-key for some one; it may be some score, or hundreds, or thousands. The already recognized author, with whom his affinities may be more or less strong, takes his hand as a brother—after the public has accepted him—sometimes before. The unsuccessful authors, seeing that he is aloft, struggle to the surface through the dark waves of oblivion and grasp at him, in the vain hope that he can keep their heads, as well as his own, above water. The hitherto undiscovered twentieth cousin starts up in the huckleberry bushes, and claims him as a relative.

There is one more trial which touches the finest sensibilities of an author. The reader who has adopted him as his favorite, or his object of admiration, has formed an ideal of his person, his expression, his voice, his manner. How rarely does an author correspond to this ideal picture!

Now, as to all these troubles of authorship, there are two ways of dealing with them. An author has a perfect right to say: "I am not on exhibition, like the fat boy or the double-headed lady. If I were, I should charge the usual price of admission to the show. It is not my profession to write letters to strangers who consult me on all manner of questions, involving their private interests. These people have no right to appropriate my hours of labor, and I will have my rights, even if I am an author."

This is one way of looking at the question, and I am by no means sure that, hard and almost churlish as it seems, it is not, on the whole, the wisest for all concerned. Sooner or later the burden of correspondence becomes so heavy as to be insupportable, unless some short and easy method can be found of dealing with epistolary aggressions; such, for instance, as a printed formula, or a number of such formulas, which the author can sign by the dozen, and which will, in the large majority of cases, answer every purpose. This is the plan Willis adopted and announced long ago.

It must not be forgotten, on the other hand, that all human beings have a certain claim on each other. The writer who has attained success owes something to those who are struggling to attain it. It is perfectly true that the greatest number of young persons who write to noted authors are entirely destitute of any exceptional talent which gives them any claim to be encouraged to devote themselves to literary pursuits. Still, they are fellow-creatures, and if Nature has denied to them the gifts which they fondly believe themselves to possess, they are entitled, not to our scorn and ridicule, but to our tender consideration. We never laugh at the idiot, but we are too ready to make sport of the weakling.

On the whole it is better to handle a feeble literary aspirant gently, and let him print his little book—for that is the natural crisis of his complaint. Let him, did I say? The powers of the universe could not prevent him from doing it. He asks your advice, and all the time he has his proof-sheets in his desk or his pocket. And it must never be forgotten that in the midst of the weeds of vanity and folly, there is, in some unexpected way, in the place where you never thought of it, may spring up the shoot which will bear the fruit of genius. Fortunately, as a general rule, mediocrity is the first line or the first sentence of its manifesto.

A Month of Housekeeping.

By BETSY B.

"THE truth of the matter is," cried Flo, after a spirited argument over the vexed question; "the truth of the matter is that the difficulty lies with the masters and mistresses quite as much as with the servants. You will see how smoothly I shall glide along."

Two years of wandering and a further two years' siege of hotel life had made Flo begin to yearn for her own ingle nook. She had been house-hunting for a fortnight, had secured a hijou, signed a two years' lease, and was now looking for a miraculous Chinaman, and invited me to pass a month with her when he should be found.

"I can easily fancy the trials of the hausfrau in the East," went on Flo, quite knowingly, "hut in San Francisco, with this vast horde of Chinaman to draw from, these quiet, dexterous, soft-stepping fellows, who take to cooking with the genius of a Frenchman, and to cleanliness with the instinct of a Mohammedan, (in a book,) there can not be any great difficulty. Then, too, they live on rice, a comparatively inexpensive article of food, and are economical by instinct."

"And where will you go to look for this miracle?" I ventured to ask.

"Oh," said Flo, "they are plentiful enough, but it is always better to hear of them through a friend. I do not place much reliance on the intelligence offices."

The arrival of a Chinaman from a friend was simultaneous with our own. He was accompanied by a small assistant, a ridiculous duplicate of Crooks himself, for "the friend" stood godfather to every Chinaman sent. The small boy had a pair of bead eyes like a bird's, a small, shrill voice, and an absolute ignorance of any word but his native Chinese, together with an inordinate fondness for carrying on long conversations in that tongue. At the expiration of two days he had learned to say "all right," but the fact that he said it without any relevance whatever detracted something from its usefulness. As it was also discovered at the end of that time that soda biscuits and apple pie were Crooks's sole accomplishments, Flo gently but firmly requested the return of the twin to Chinatown. Accordingly, after dinner they packed their pocket-handkerchiefs, and came into the library to give us all a cheerful good-bye.

"Really," confessed Flo, after they had left, "I have had a little private dread of dismissing a servant, but this little affair has passed off so comfortably that I am now determined to keep on trying until I get a first-class cook. Mr. Brooks will send me one to-morrow morning."

Brooks and his blue handkerchief arrived in due time. Brooks perpetrated one meal and an apple-pie. He was seen to depart through the back-gate shortly thereafter—a sure sign of deep humiliation on the part of a Chinaman leaving his place, and a portentous glare in Flo's eye for the remainder of the day prevented our asking any questions.

Gretchen, the little major-domo of the household, reigned in the kitchen for two days. At the end of that time we had recovered from Brooks's pie, and the smile had returned to Flo's face.

"I am to have a first-class Chinaman at last," she informed us at the dinner-table. "You know what epicures the Snooks are. Well, a Chinaman who lived with them for five years has just returned from China, and Mr. Snooks will send him over to-morrow morning. What I really want," went on Flo, "is not so much a French cook as a cosmopolitan one. I should like one who could give me a Southern breakfast in the morning, a Yankee lunch or tea, a French dinner, and an English supper. Now, a Frenchman's talent seems all in one groove; but the Chinese are adaptable, and learn anything. I should like one with a wide experience and a civilized palate, and they tell me that Ah Gee is all that I can ask. I am determined that my dinners shall be chefs-d'œuvre by the time Bob comes home."

* * * * *

"What do you think Ah Gee is making?" cried Flo next day, bursting into the room, with indignation in every quiver of her lip, and the fire of a coming storm in the glance of her eye. "Apple-pie!" She fairly shrieked it. "Apple-pie! and I was too dumb with surprise, indignation, satiety—whatever you like—to forbid him. Biscuits and apple-pie! I begin to feel as if the whole world were one big apple-pie, tastefully trimmed around with soda biscuits."

"My dearest Flo, quiet yourself," I said. "Do you not know that a Chinaman always prides himself upon what he can do with the flour-barrel? Any of them can make anything you like in flour, from a vol-au-vent to a batter-cake. Therefore, it is their natural instinct, when they go to a new place, to put the best foot foremost, and show first what they can do best. The deeper mysteries of sauces are sealed to their opium-dulled palates, and they learn the cooking of meats only by sight. Yet they can learn anything, and one of the beauties of teaching them is, that they need to be shown but once. Why not teach Ah Gee, who seems to be a ductile sort of creature? Mold him to your will, and make of him the phenomenon that you seek."

"I will," said Flo, taking fire at the thought, and with all the energy of a new resolution she plunged into the kitchen.

For three days she was visible only at intervals. Ah Gee became wildly hilarious for a Chinaman. That is to say, the dull, apathetic, listless look of his countrymen still hung upon his face, but bursts of Chinese song, in the shrillest falsetto, reached us at intervals from the back domains. Everything learned from the despised white race is accounted so much capital by the copper Mongolian, whether it be a recipe for a stew or a lesson in English.

Appetizing little dishes served in fanciful ways became their things with us. The dishes lost the Chinese sameness of flavor, and visions of dinner-parties began to loom up in Flo's imagination. Flo lost her appetite with much tasting, and her spirits waned in the heat of the kitchen fire, hut Gee's education was getting on, and the miraculous Chinaman seemed once more a not impossible thing. Then Flo, acting upon a theory of her own, that cooks should be left to their own devices, began to abandon the kitchen. But not for long. As the flavors gradually began to disappear, she returned to her mission, and, being a little woman with a certain amount of energy which never goes hand in hand with patience, she addressed Ah Gee several times in the course of the afternoon in that tone of voice most frequently employed by the vexed housewife.

It is one of the peculiarities of the Chinese species that under a uniform of stolid apathy they carry a uniform of acute sensitiveness, and are as liable as a woman to hurt into a flood of tears at any moment. To Flo's dismay, she discovered Gee presently weeping bitterly into the sink.

"What's the matter, Gee?" exclaimed his mistress.

"Oh, madam, you no likee me no more," spake the heathen, while his almond-eyes swelled afresh and his lips quivered.

"Don't be a fool, Gee, even if you are a Chinaman," adjured Flo, with considerable emphasis, and bounced out of the kitchen in disgust. A half hour later he appeared at her door with swollen eyes, and thus delivered himself:

"Madam, I damfool, dam Chinaman. I think more good you getee new cook."

"Very well," said Flo, cheerily, and much to the heathen's surprise, "very well, I'll get a new cook to-morrow morning."

Whereupon the weeping Gee washed his hands literally and metaphorically of all further concern in the household, delivered the kitchen over to Gretchen, and vanished.

"There are many nagging things one has to endure in this vale of tears," said Flo, as his queue swung dejectedly around the corner of the street and his white heels twinkled upon our sight for the last time; "hut a weeping Chinaman is not one of them. The fact is, I think it every one's duty to discourage the immigration of the race, and I begin to feel that I would be infinitely more comfortable with a woman in the kitchen. There is a different flavor to their cooking—a palatable home taste. After all, it is the right and natural way for white people to eat food prepared by their own race, and I propose henceforth to do the right and natural way." And forthwith Flo descended upon the intelligence offices.

She was as blithe, brisk, and unsubdued a little woman as clicked her heels upon the sidewalk that morning, and there was menace in her air as she entered the first of them. But the sparkle was gone from her eye and the pride from her mien as she sallied forth from the last of them.

"Do I look," she asked that evening, "like a woman who could be easily bullied, and catechized, and altogether subjugated?"

We mildly intimated that Bob had never succeeded in reducing her to metaphysical pulp.

"No," acknowledged Flo; "but what he has never dared to try, a string of servant-women have done. I have been actually pelted with questions of such a searching character as I would not permit to my nearest and dearest. My innermost thoughts and convictions have been torn from their sanctuary. I have been cross-examined rigidly from a domestic, a religious, a financial, and a social standpoint. I have been told a ridiculous number of times that I would not do, and have been alternating all day between blind rage and hysterical amusement."

"And have you found no one whom you suited?"

"Well, yes; I have chosen a small, frail creature, with whom a home is an object rather than wages."

"Ah, Flo," I interrupted, "the laborer is worthy of his hire; and if he be not worthy of it, he is essentially good for nothing. Is she altogether an experiment?"

"Well, no; she seems diffident and unwilling to boast of her accomplishments, but she has been a married woman, and kept house for fifteen years, and you will admit that that is something of an experience. However, interview her for yourself, and pass an opinion—will you not?"

I did improvise an errand to the scene of terrors, and Flo, being unable to restrain her curiosity, improvised another and followed me. The new-comer was a small, scared, timid creature, and expressed herself repeatedly as being willing to try. People imbibe a respect for "trying" from their first copy-hooks, and when she informed us repeatedly that "she would do the best she could," Flo began to think she had discovered a treasure.

"Ah, by the way, what is your name?" one of us asked, at length. And when she replied, timidly, "Mrs. Gallin-court," we were both quite crushed by the weight of the small creature's syllables.

Flo rallied first. "Don't you think," she began, "or rather—that is to say, I think better—in point of fact it is a time-honored custom in our family to address servants by—in short, by their front name," went on Flo, lapsing into slang somewhat lamely.

"My name is really Julia," said the small woman, meekly; "hut I've never lived out before, and I don't feel like a servant; I call myself the help," she perorated, bursting into tears.

We fled the kitchen at sight of them.

"If she is a crier," said Flo, firmly, when she reached the upper regions—"if she dares to be a crier, she perishes at the point of the carving-knife, without a flinch on my part."

When Flo took up housekeeping, and was setting forth her theories with all the confidence of the untried, she announced a deep-seated fondness for fancy cooking, and an unalterable determination to have it. She also decided to make the first dinner a test of each new cook. She would provide with an abundance which would terrify or delight them, as the case might be, hut she would leave them to prepare it according to their own skill and knowledge, and without any direction.

Julia was simply terrified at the prospect, hut Flo relentlessly left her to herself, and calmly awaited dinner. At seven o'clock it was not yet announced. At half past seven Gretchen reported that Julia was still struggling with the bill of fare, but had not made much headway. At eight Flo bounced into the kitchen. To describe her gait in any other manner would be simply to modify the truth.

But at sight of Julia's timid face, the down-pouring streams of perspiration, and the heads of agony on her brow, Flo's heart softened.

"What is the matter with the dinner, Julia?" she asked, gently.

"Well," answered the unhappy Julia; "there seems to be so many things here that I never heard of before, that I don't exactly know how to go at 'em. But I'm trying, I'm doing the best I can."

"I thought you were a married woman and had kept house fifteen years," said Flo, severely.

"And so I did," whimpered Julia; "hut I lived on a ranch, and he liked nothing hut hog meat, and I cooked that, mostly. People did say I made pretty good bread, though, and I have fixed up a little thing for dessert that you may like," and Julia smiled at her forthcoming triumph, and removed a d'oyley from the concealed master-piece.

The ominous flash of Flo's eye told me in a glance that it could be nothing else than apple-pie.

"Woman!" said she, with deadly calm. "I could have borne aught else than this! You were a poor, forlorn, willing creature, and I took you in. I had intended to bring a battery of culinary intellect to bear upon your understanding. Pierre Blot, Mrs. Henderson, Marian Harland, Mrs. Beecher, Mrs. Hill, Miss Parloa, the Tilden recipes, and a file of clippings are upon my dressing-table at this moment, selected as the text-books for your education. I would have made you a pearl of great price, and set you, so to speak, upon your culinary legs. But a cook who begins with apple-pie—"

"I'm sure I done the best I could. I tried!"—whined Julia.

"—stirs all that is combative in my nature," went on Flo. "Your late consort's fancy for a diet of hog meat may have helped to make your case a hopeless one, but your pastry is your fatal flaw for me. You may leave Gretchen to finish the dinner, and devote the remainder of the evening to making your farewells."

"I will abandon my Quixotic scheme of teaching some one to cook," announced Flo, next morning, "and shall demand an experienced cook with the finest references and the first reputation. Temperament is very much a matter of climate and food. I think our fancies must be finer for eating artistic food, as our tastes become more cultivated for being surrounded with beauty. The desire of my soul is an aesthetic cook; but, as I have not money enough to buy one, I content myself with one who means."

The yearner came next day—a hale, buxom, merry-looking woman. She had lived with every epicure in town, but had not a reference to show.

"What does a piece of paper amount to?" spoke Flo. "Do we not take in Chinese all the time without a question?"

Her first dinner was delicious. Soup clear and strong enough to delight a gourmet; smelts curled up into Montagues and served with a new and most ingenious sauce; lambs' tongues with Spanish sauce; a roast, done to a turn, and basted with unusual fidelity; vegetables so palatable that they made your mouth water; a salad which was the perfection of mingling; and a dessert whose secret we have never since been able to discover. It was a miracle in eggs, but the worker never told her trick. Flo and I shook hands warmly upon the entrance of each course, and gazed at each other with speechless delight each first taste; while Gretchen hovered over us with a proprietary interest in the success of everything, which was quite touching.

"I would be a happy woman," said Flo, in the plenitude of her satisfaction after dinner, "I would be a happy woman, if I dared; but it is too good to last, and what do you suppose is the matter?"

"My dear Flo," I answered, "genius, as you know, is crochety, and always has its vagaries. A good cook is a genius, and a good cook always either drinks or has a high temper. If she has a temper, avoid the kitchen. If she drinks, put her to bed till the spree is over, and we will span the intervals as best we can."

"I will," said Flo, succinctly, and waited events.

For four blissful days we lived upon the fat of the land, and the cooking was something to write a poem about.

On the fifth day it was evident from the first that the dinner was going to be something queer. We ate in solemn silence, and Flo and I would not catch each other's eye.

"You do not seem to be animated by the expressive sympathy of Monday last," commented one who had been a silent and amused observer of the struggle. "I would shake hands, if I were you, over that last course. When a thing is monumentally bad, it deserves some notice, and I don't think I ever tasted anything quite so execrable."

"Nor I," assented Flo, moodily; "and as for this one, if I were not familiar with the habits of the Oregon grouse, I should say that bird was in a state of beastly intoxication." The whole dishful did look ridiculously drunk. Their legs and wings flew out from their little bodies quite at random, just as the fire had distorted them; and they actually leered, though they hadn't an eye to leer with. They were burnt or raw, just as the cook had happened to feel between drinks.

"If there are any accompaniments," said Flo, in her most rigid manner, "I should like to see them appear."

A huge bloated face came suddenly at the slide; there was a thick murmur of something having been forgotten, and two vegetable dishes were thrust in. Upon opening them they were both found to contain boiled potatoes, packed like sardines. Gretchen removed one of them, and was heard in low-voiced expostulation at the slide, and presently reappeared with two other vegetable dishes.

"Perhaps we will find something to eat this time," began Flo, a little crossly, but stopped suddenly, dumb-stricken, as another pair of dishes of potatoes revealed themselves.

"The potato," said Flo, "is a popular edible, but this may be said to be an instance in point of too much of a good thing. I am going into the kitchen, but I acknowledge to a mortal fear of a drunken woman. Who will accompany me?"

Not to be outdone by the fables of history, we all got up and accompanied her; but paused upon the threshold irresolute, not for fear of the drunken woman, but because we could not get in. Flo's neat and orderly kitchen, upon which she prided herself, was a scene of desolation and disarray.

Its high priestess, with an attitude copied from the grouse, was gazing with maudlin pity at a pair of swollen feet, and apostrophizing them in thick Celtic. Vegetable peelings, dirty dishes, beer bottles, and boiled potatoes abounded. There was a red-hot fire roaring in the range, and the smoke from a pan of sweetbreads from which the water had boiled off filled the air.

"Go to bed, you drunken thing," cried Flo, fiercely, and dodged out of the door expecting an attack, but the big, bloated creature simply murmured, "Yes," meekly, and made the attempt. We followed the sound of her ascent with considerable interest, expecting momentarily to hear her clatter to the bottom. But she reached the top in safety, and threw herself across the bed without any attempt at disrobing.

"What would you do?" asked Flo, helplessly, as we heard the door close upon her. "What would you do?" And she wrung her hands like Lady Macbeth.

"Why, simply wait till she gets over it, and then go on as if nothing had happened," we all counseled oracularly, and perhaps selfishly. "We agreed in the beginning that a good cook must have a grave fault, but so violent a spree can not last long," and upon this supposition we all rested our hopes.

The sinner awoke next morning duly repentant. Figuratively, she bathed Flo's feet with her tears and kissed the hem of her garment. During the course of a long and checkered career she had never met any one who was so completely all that her fancy had painted. She would forever forswear the rosy and keep to a severe course of water and tea. Indeed, how she had been overcome the night before she could not imagine, since never, never, never, etc.

How could Flo resist in the face of the last three days' cooking? She granted the penitent full forgiveness, pointed silently but reproachfully to the wreck of order, and left the cook mistress of the situation.

In half an hour little Gretchen came running in, pale with affright and indignation.

"The cook is tipsy, again," she gasped, "and I can't do nothing with her."

Then Flo arose in her might, afraid of no one, drunk or sober, and sailing into the scene of action she discharged the batteries of her wrath. Flo is a mere dot of a woman, and the cook loomed up above her big, round, and purple, but she quailed before her little mistress, and slunk sadly and slowly away from the beer bottle, and went out into the rain a sadder but not a wiser woman, for we heard of her in the police court a fortnight later, and we wept salt tears over a genius dethroned by alcohol.

Beer was her favorite tippie, but a survey of the premises after her departure disclosed an omnivorous appetite. Whisky, wine, beer, Santa Cruz rum, had disappeared like dew before sunrise, and even the alcohol bottle was at low tide.

"I have been trying to estimate the expenses of this week," said Flo, a day later, "and what between the advanced wages paid my fine cook, the food destroyed by her, the dishes broken, and the liquor consumed, the wear and tear on my mind, and the utter uprooting of my anchor of faith in human kind, I find it makes up a pretty long column."

A Chinese boy was procured to clear up the wreck of the drunken cook's devastating week, and he was so deft, so quick, so clean, so altogether comfortable, that I found Flo frequently eyeing him wistfully.

"My dear Flo," I said, "I see you daily drifting again to Chinatown. Confess that you have had enough of women—that the soft, cat-like glide, and the quiet, meaningless face of the heathen, are attracting you once again."

"Well," said Flo, "what is the use of battling against the customs? It is the Chinaman's country, and one may as well submit to the idea first as last. If I could find a treasure—"

"I know a treasure," I ventured at last to say, somewhat reluctantly, for I never like to recommend a doctor, a dress-maker, or a cook; "I know a treasure, but he is already bespoken. Yet it may chance that that treasure knows another treasure, whom I will guarantee if he be recommended by mine. I will go look him up this very morning, and you shall have a first-class cook before the sun sets to-morrow."

"Ah, what a beautiful thing is friendship," murmured Flo, with a huge sigh of relief, and settled down to absolute peace of mind for twenty-four hours.

I discovered a Chinaman so highly recommended that I wondered the Union Club had not picked him up long ago. He was of the more aristocratic type, when he appeared in dark, rich, silken garments, with his native shoes upon his feet and his native cap upon his head. Flo and I both expressed ourselves as having a horror of the hybrid creature who dresses in the composite style, as compared with this tall, well-dressed Chinaman. He further inspired us with respect by demanding such a price, to be paid weekly, as only a chef would dare to ask; and Flo showed him the way to the kitchen with a smile of the liveliest hope.

"I fancy, Flo, that we have stumbled by chance upon the one entire and perfect chrysolite in the way of cooks," I said, as she reappeared. "What might this mandarin's name be? We may as well get used to it at once."

"Gong," said Flo, shortly; "and it went off, when he said it, like a cheap door-bell. I don't exactly like his name, and there seems to be an evil gleam in his narrow eye. But I don't care if he is a highbinder, so he can cook."

"It is not an acknowledged fact, but it is nevertheless true, that no one ever does anything well who has not a spice of the devil in them; and Gong would not look well with a halo around his head. I await dinner with the utmost impatience."

"Well, for once," said Flo, "I am unprepared for a new cook, and it is Sunday. The human family is visited with an insane idea that Sunday is the day for good dinners—Sunday, when the markets are closed, and the ice gives out, and the fish can not possibly be kept fresh. I never attempt an extra dinner on Sunday. It is my day for roast beef—a good, honest rib-roast; no skewering, and rolling, and chipping, and trimming, but a good rib-roast, ribs and all. It is the pride of my heart. I have put it in countenance to-day with a pair of canvas-back ducks, but I have nothing which to test Gong. Any fool can cook ducks and roast-beef, but I have a little theory of my own that fish are the actual test for a cordon bleu."

We went to dinner in high spirits. People always do go to a duck dinner in high spirits, for the digestible bird seems to affect them pleasantly beforehand.

The ducks came on. They were stuffed. They were roasted as black as a hat and as dry as a bone. They had been in the oven a good hour.

"I will keep my temper," said Flo. "Though I die for it, I will keep my temper. There must be some misunderstanding. Gretchen, cause the roast beef to appear."

It appeared. Flo almost wept as she saw it. With that imitiveness which possesses the Chinese mind, Gong had attempted to roll the roast, but the attempt confounded him. The bone had been torn with unsurgeon-like skill from the lacerated meat. The skewers wouldn't pierce it, the strings wouldn't hold it, and it flopped and wobbled around the dish, resisting the carver till it seemed like a thing alive, and made us all laugh uproariously, but Flo.

"Fate could deal me but one more blow at this dinner," she said, when the roast was removed, "and that is apple-pie."

"Apple-pie!" said Gretchen at the moment, and placed one on the table.

In silence Flo rose from her seat, and in silence she returned to it.

"Is Gong gone?" asked the first one who dared to break the spell.

"He is," spoke the hostess, solemnly.

"Is he dead?" asked the carver, with corresponding gravity.

"No," answered Flo; "I have permitted him to live to find out how canvas-backs ducks are cooked. If there be any of the spirit of Vatel in China, the humiliation of it will break his heart."

And, sure enough, we did hear that he went to the friend who had recommended him, and wept long and bitterly over his brief, disastrous day.

By that time two or three of his fellow-countrymen had come and gone. One of them was of an excessively ornamental character, who had recently been taking lessons of a pastry cook, and was immensely proud of his icing. Discovering that Flo was fond of decoration, he attempted, upon the occasion of a small dinner-party, to make the room beautiful. When we went to table we found little curly-queues of icing over everything, in little strings along the table-cloth, in grotesque figures on the fruit, on the handles of the soup-tureen, and even, upon later investigation, hanging like sweet stalactites to the tassels of the window shades.

"I can not struggle any longer with their stupidity. I must have some one who speaks English," cried Flo, and tried another girl.

They all had a specialty but this one. But her cooking was as negative as if she had no palate. Being told that it was flavorless, she piled everything high with red pepper; and being told that it was too hot, she left out everything, even the salt.

"If I had only known a French cook was what you wanted, ma'am," she said, when she was discharged, "I could have got a woman to come in and teach me for five dollars. I am willing to learn."

"I think these willing people are the most trying of the incapables," complained Flo, when the door had shut upon this last one. "But the curious thing about cooks is that they all demand the price of skill, whether they know anything or not. Where am I to go, where can I go, for a cook?" And who could tell her? "I must wait, as others do, till one drops in upon me from heaven. I am willing to pay more than fair wages. I have a good home, a small family, and I put the washing out. You will pardon my relating these homely details, but I have become so used to telling them in the intelligence offices that they come pat. And, withal, you see for yourself what my experience is. My friends tell me that I must go in the kitchen and superintend. I will go in and exercise my capacity in that line. But I want to see what they can do before I become a culinary engineer."

"My dearest Flo," I said, "you have expressed a pet idea of my own in that last word. It has long been my dream, when my ship comes in, to establish a cooking academy. It shall be as complete as a university. There shall be professors in French, Spanish, German, Jewish, and American cooking. The complete course will cover the ground of all the nations, but pupils may take lessons in any one department if they like. Our diplomas will be priceless paper, for the pupils may not graduate in any course, or all, until they have passed a rigid examination before a board of epicures. They will be in such demand that not one of them need ever be idle a day. Housewives will arise and call me blessed. The kitchen will be the studio of a new art. Cooks will rise to a proper sense of the magnitude of their own genius, and the world will rise with them. As the artist transforms canvas and pigments into a thing of beauty, so the cook will transform beef or mutton into a thing of joy. For, after all, Flo, we eat only beef, mutton, and poultry, and it is only the artistic or the unskillful handling of them that makes the difference."

"And in the meantime, while you are waiting for your ship to come in, and for your protégés to be educated up to this superb standard, in the meantime what do we eat?" "In the meantime, dear Flo," I said, sadly, "in the meantime, there seems nothing left to do but to eat apple-pie!"

ENGLAND AND AMERICA.

In a recent letter to the Philadelphia Press, its Paris correspondent thus writes concerning British ignorance of America:

I was lately at a dinner-party where the guests were all Americans, and all of them had made a sojourn of longer or shorter duration in London. The conversation turned on the really comical ignorance of all things American displayed by the best educated English people, and numerous anecdotes in illustration of the topic in question were cited. One of these related to the son of a former United States Minister in London, Mr. Edwards Pierrepont. At some public dinner one of the guests asked Mr. Pierrepont Jr., while his father was in the act of making a speech, who the orator was. The young gentleman made answer that that was the American Minister. "Is he of the Established Church or a Dissenter?" was the next question. But this does not quite equal the query of the Archbishop of Canterbury, who lately asked of an American visitor to explain to him "the attitude assumed by the United States toward Dissenters." Next came a young Southern gentleman, who described an interview that he had recently had with an English lady, who was introduced to him as a prodigy of intellect and of learning. "You come from the Southern States, sir?" she remarked, amiably; "which of the two did you come from—Missouri or Peru?" With great presence of mind my young friend informed her that he was then residing in Peru, but intended shortly to remove to Missouri. But I rather think that the climax was capped by an English author, who, on being told by an American lady that she came from Missouri, said, thoughtfully: "Missouri—let me see—what State is that in?" "Missouri is a State," responded the lady. "Ah, yes—yes—to be sure it is—it is Mississippi that I was thinking of." I myself have become thoroughly case-hardened on the subject; so that when a charming English lady, the wife of a distinguished Indian officer, asked me one day if it were not very dangerous to walk in the environs of Philadelphia on account of the rattlesnakes, I was enabled to answer her without moving a muscle of my countenance.

A writer in the Boston Transcript remarks that in addition to the ignorance prevailing in England regarding American affairs, there is an almost universal feeling of contempt toward America. He says:

There is hardly a public journal which does not at times reflect at least English ignorance of America, if not English spleen and bitterness. A conspicuous example of these sources of misrepresentation is the Times, which has always been not an advanced leader of the higher culture of England, but a polished reflector of vulgar opinion. In 1861 Mr. Bright said of this great journal that it "bad not had, since Mr. Lincoln took office, one fair, and honorable, and friendly article on American affairs." Four years later, in 1865, Mr. Bright said again that the course of the Times had been one of "four years' uninterrupted publication of lies with regard to America." * * * It has not been the custom with English journals to have more than a few lines of American news. The Standard, a conservative paper, has quite recently set an example of enterprise in this respect, but it is a new departure. The rule has been, and with most journals still is, a few lines daily of American news. But when the Giteau business was in hand at Washington, English journalism generally showed a great appetite for a selection of the most disgusting facts. It is a commonplace in England that American journals sin abominably in their reports of disgusting matters. Yet here was all England fed on the garbage of the Giteau trial, although for respectable news English journalism has not found America worth special attention. All this maintains a state of things naturally antagonistic to America. Mr. Roebuck, the Sheffield plebeian in Parliament, who, during our civil war, attempted to get England and the Emperor Napoleon to join in recognizing the Confederacy, gave voice, in his gross ignorance and almost infamous spleen, to a traditional barbarism which lies heavy on the whole land.

By way of retort courteous to English contempt of American institutions, the Springfield Republican thus relieves its mind on Anglomania:

If among the people of England should suddenly spread a servile imitation of American speech, dress, and customs—taking good and bad alike, and the bad principally—cultivated Englishmen would be apt to speak of it as "beastly rot." But although Americans speak English, it is not that sort of English. So the present fashionable Anglomania, which has all but turned the brains of would-be ladies of society and their followers, may be truthfully and in pure English spoken of as a vulgar, silly, and unpatriotic craze. Let us extol and buy American carriages, that are light, easy, and graceful, and adapted to our roads, our horses, and our climate, rather than to import English carriages, that are heavy and ugly. Why do people make themselves uncomfortable and ludicrous by churning about in village carts? Can anything be more ridiculous than a big man in a village cart in Fifth Avenue? Yet it is seen every day, and many times a day. If it had been an American fashion, the people who use them now would suffer anything short of a martyrdom equal to driving in one of these abominations rather than to follow the fashion. Then, after the manner of the English prize fighter, every lank youth, with arms like pipe-stems, swaggers up the street with his elbows at right angles to his body—except when he forgets himself for a moment, and drops his arms into their natural position with a sigh of relief. Then because the "haw haw" Englishman says "It's so caddish, you know," Americans copy the vulgarity; when they should simply their speech and speak pure English by saying "ill-bred" instead. Then, too, because he talks always of "the play," we must never say English as the other, and the one is customary among us, the other is not so. Then because the English natives are so stupid that they will not have a check system for baggage on their railroads, and don't call the bits of brass "checks," but "brashes," they find plenty of geese ready to follow their lead, when to the uninitiated American mind "brashes" would mean a pair of andirons and a fender. Then, having the misfortune to live in an atmosphere of fog, they seldom have a wholly good day, and so when they come over here and see bright days, such as they never dreamed of, they remark, patronizingly: "It's not half a bad day," and presume to laugh at us for saying: "It is a lovely day." "Ah, there goes that American 'lovely,' you know." It isn't "good form"—what is "good form"?—in society to introduce people in England, and so true politeness is to be pushed to the wall, and we are to meet with a cold frigidity, and be thoroughly uncomfortable, and make all about us so, because "it's English." Travelers abroad and the newspapers are having a notably bad influence in one especial way—and that is, in trying to change a nomenclature which belongs to us by right of birth to one which is as foreign to us as French would be. Forty years ago, when steam came into use in both nations, we were practically foreigners to one another. On each side of the ocean a natural set of terms became incorporated into the language, and belong where they are, because the same terms convey no ideas if transplanted. In England railroads are railways, the rails are the "metals," the switch is a "shunt," cars are coaches, engineers are drivers, firemen are stokers, conductors are guards, baggage is luggage—all equally good terms and equally good English; but our terms are as foreign to them as theirs are to us. What would be thought in England if any English-born person should use American terms? They would be scoffed at. Then let Americans be scoffed at also when they attempt to change their nomenclature. Why confuse the great mass by this silly introduction of foreign terms? Why should a Pullman car be called a coach, which it resembles no more than a wheelbarrow? English people, perhaps, feel obliged to be aggressively national because their country is such very a small one, and because America is such a large one, and they may be swallowed up; and it is the toughest thing in life to lose one's individual grip. Let us sympathize with them and indulge them, and teach them better manners when they come to America—to take off their hats when they pass a lady in a hotel corridor or meet her in an elevator, instead of hat on head, and hands in Brüss breeches pockets, to give her a long stare, as is their usual custom. Let us teach them that "beastly" and "nasty" are not nice words, and let us feel proud of the Cleveland "nice" and "Wilde, when he said: 'Oh, don't you think 'nice'?' replied: 'Do you think 'nasty' is a nice word?'"

PUBLISHERS' NOTICE.

The Argonaut is published every Saturday, at No. 522 California Street, by the Argonaut Publishing Company.

Subscription, $4.00 per year; six months, $2.25; three months, $1.50, payable in advance—postage prepaid. City subscribers served by Carriers at $4.50 per year, or 10 cents per week. Sample copies free. Single copies, 10 cents.

News Dealers and Agents in the interior supplied by the San Francisco News Company, Post Street, above Dupont, to whom all orders from the trade should be addressed.

The American News Company, New York, and branches, are Agents for the Eastern trade. The Argonaut can be ordered from any News Dealer in the United States or Europe.

Persons mailing single copies of the Argonaut must affix a two-cent stamp.

No traveling canvassers employed. Order by mail, or through your local News Dealer.

Subscribers wishing their addresses changed should give their old as well as new addresses.

Address all communications to "The Argonaut, 522 California Street, San Francisco."

A. P. STANTON, Business Manager.

ENTERED AT THE SAN FRANCISCO POSTOFFICE AS SECOND CLASS MATTER.

THE ARGONAUT.

FRANK M. PIXLEY - - - - - Editor.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 23, 1882.

CONTENTS:

EDITORIALS: The Distinguished Visitors who now Flock to our Shores—The State of our City as a Pleasure Resort—The Lack of Cheap and Pure Amusements—A Scheme for the Benefaction and Beautifying of our City—A Word of Advice to the Charter-makers—Railroad and Freight Facilities and the Increasing Business of this State—A Review of the Official Count of the Late Election—A few points showing how Estee ran behind his Ticket.....	16-17
COURTING A FAIRY QUEEN: A Story of the Stage. By BOUTVILLE.....	2-3
ON ACCOUNT OF A FRIEND: Foiled in Love and Fortune. By JAMES HARDY.....	4-5
THE LEGEND OF THE VILAS: A Hindustanee Tradition.....	5
A MORAL TALE IN VERSE. By ALFRED HARDIE.....	5
A CHRISTMAS NIGHT IN THE CITY OF MEXICO: A Tale of Romance and Revolution. By JOSE F. GODOY.....	6
ERATO: A PASSION PLAINT, by THOMAS S. COLLIER; VIVIEN, by CARLOTTA PERRY; SESTINA, by PHILIP SHIRLEY; OPAL, by FANNY DRISCOLL.....	7
LEGEND AND SUPERSTITION.....	7
THE BILED OWL: A Christmas Vision of San Francisco in 1982. By DAN. O'CONNELL.....	8
THE LOST SHIP "MARIGOLD": A Tale of an Inhabited Island in the Pacific, not upon the Charts. By ROBERT DUNCAN MILNE.....	9-11
THE LATEST MAGAZINE VERSE: THE LADIES OF ST. JAMES'S, by AUSTIN DORSON; SONNET, by H. H.; POCAHONTAS, by MARGARET PRESTON.....	11
INDIVIDUALITIES.....	11
SOCIETY: The McLaughlin Party—Weddings and Engagements—The Week's Festivities—Notes and Gossip.....	12
FROM MANHATTAN ISLAND: FLANEUR'S Weekly Budget of New York Gossip.....	13
A MONTH OF HOUSEKEEPING: A Chronicle of the Kitchen. By BETSY B.....	14
ENGLAND AND AMERICA.....	15
THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS.....	18
LITERARY NOTES.....	19
DRAMA: Betsy B.'s Letter—Gilbert and Sullivan's New Opera, "Iolanthe"—Theatrical Gossip.....	20
STORYTTES.....	22
THOLUJ—THE HANGED: A Dream of Christianity and Socialism. By NATHAN THE ESSENEAN.....	25
THE MACHINE MUSE: Some Notes on Verse-making Made Easy.....	26
THE INNER MAN.....	28
AFTER THE DANCE.....	30

San Francisco is gaining sufficient rank among the great cities of the world to receive visits from the more distinguished people who travel for amusement or business. Not only in geographical position is it eligibly located, but in point of population it is rising into the upper, if not the first, rank of commercial cities. Holding to our Western and Pacific coast the same relation that New York does to the Eastern and Atlantic, we may reasonably expect a growth commensurate with the expansion of Pacific commerce and the growth of our Pacific empire. We find ourselves already on one of the great highways of the world's commerce. India, China, the Pacific islands, and Australia find their natural road of travel to the Atlantic States and Europe through our Golden Gate. The European traveler does not think his American tour complete unless he has visited these western coasts. The world tourist is not the world tourist unless he has done the splendid scenery of the Pacific States and Territories. The same class of steamships that navigate the Atlantic will be brought to the Pacific. Two days of time can be saved by rail from San Francisco to New York. As California becomes better known, it is being recognized as one of the earth's most delightful sanitariums. It is coming to be understood among the folk of wealth and leisure that ours is a good spot to enjoy their otium; that we have an agreeable climate in spots; and that the bon vivant may indulge in all sorts of creature comforts and physical enjoyments, beginning with strawberries in March, and ending with oranges in February. Some of the distinguished strangers, like the Marquis of Lorne and the Royal Princess, his wife, will spend money among us. Some, like the Swedish Nilsson, will take it away from us. We are not indifferent to the fact that our city is of sufficient importance to detain for a time these distinguished travelers, or to have attracted one of the world's most famous musical artists. Next summer there comes to us the conclave of Knights Templars; and, as railroads shall be builded and traveling accommodations multiplied, we may reasonably anticipate that San Francisco will become one of the shrines of a fashionable pilgrimage. In this coming travel there is profit to us, if we endeavor to encourage it. To make the city an attractive place to visit, and an agreeable home in which to reside, there is something demanded of ourselves and of our municipal government and charter-makers; and, while we would not say one word in encouragement of criminal or extravagant municipal expenditure, we would suggest the maxim of "penny wise, pound foolish." Our hotels are, beyond any that we know, comfortable in accommodation and reasonable in charges. Our streets, beyond any we have ever seen, are awfully awful. Our plazas are, if not unsightly, at least unattractive. Our park, with its splendid possibilities and ocean drive, is a drifting Sahara, with narrow and dangerous roads. It possesses an elegant conservatory and about fifteen acres of lawn and flowering shrubs. Occasional music is paid for by private subscription. There is a speed drive and broad boulevard, depending upon the donations of men who love horses better than money. The amusements of our city are costly beyond the reach of the middle class, or cheap and vulgar below the demands of people of culture and taste. Government, city, and State spend money lavishly upon prisons, schools of reform, and Magdalen asylums, but not one dollar in answer to the universal prayer that goes up from the young and unamused, "Lead us not into temptation." We license the vicious to sell intoxicating drinks. We indulge the gambling-hell and the brothel. We allow trades-unions, which steal employment from our boys and girls. We permit their parents to be debauched, and their bones made desolate and unattractive; and then, in our supercilious goodness, we wonder that our moonlight nights, and soft, balmy, summer atmosphere, give us hoodlums, vagrancy, and crime. We build churches of architectural beauty, hire eloquent preachers, employ sweet and costly singers, and rent upholstered pews along carpeted aisles, while the inexorable tyrant which dominates dominion and congregation fixes the standard of fashionable dress, and then we—good, pious people, who love Jesus—wonder why the poor or the ill-clad do not flock to our churches, and worship the (to them) unknown god; wonder why they go to the seaside garden to hear a military band on Sunday, (price ten cents,) or flock away to the green and shady spots in the country beside stream or ocean, where they hear solemn anthems sung in the roar of the sea, and listen, in the meadows and groves, to the melody of birds and babbling brooks.

The wonder to us is that the devil does not get more of our boys and girls. The other wonder is that business men, and tax-payers, and boards of supervisors, and charter-makers do not recognize the business sense, the economy, and the safety of providing places of cheap and rational amusement for that large class who are too justly proud to present themselves at a church-door on a Sunday to meet the supercilious eyebrow insolence of disdainful, well-dressed, fashionable Christians; who are too poor to pay for a family box at the theatre; who do not keep their carriages for a Park drive; who work for two dollars a day when work can be obtained, and who live and toil, as the laboring poor always do in all countries and as they have done in all ages, from hand to mouth. In this country all these boys will vote, and if the wise statesmen of the time do not see to it that they do not grow up in idleness and crime, in ignorance of law and indifference to moral codes, society will find its harvest gathered by a whirlwind. There should be provided in San Francisco for the young, the poor, and the middle classes a respectable, attractive place of cheap and rational amusement, where children can play, where young people can gather, and where elders can spend a pleasant hour. Cleanliness and good conduct should be the price of admission. It should be attractive enough for everybody. It should not be out of the reach of anybody, and this is what we would do: We would take Portsmouth Square first, because of its location, being in the vicinity of one of the poorer parts of the town. We would build over it a palace of iron and glass which, together with its inner arrangements, should cost half a million of dollars. We would entrust its construction, management, and the expenditure of all moneys to an unsalaried commission of un-Christian gentlemen. In this crystal palace we would have conservatories for flowers, with walks and fountains, not unlike the Park conservatory; a dancing-hall with music, a stage and auditorium for lectures, concerts, or volunteer private theatricals; a reading-room, warm and comfortable, with books for the common people; a casino, where cheap refreshments could be had at the cost of their production—coffee, tea, and chocolate of the best kind, no alcoholic, vinous, or malt liquors, but candies, and popcorn, and fruit for children. In the centre should be a grand fountain with music and a promenade, and on the outer edges alcoves, nooks, and quiet corners for love-making and flirtation. There should be grottos and fountains in a fantastic garden with singing-birds, a museum with curiosities, an aquarium with fishes, a skating-rink, and a gymnasium. It should be a place where the laborer, coming in tired from his daily toil, could go and smoke his pipe; where old wives could gossip, and young ones take their children; where boys, and girls, and young men, and maidens could meet. We would have this pleasure-resort brilliant with lights, a place of pure air, warmed to the proper degree in winter, and fanned by breezes in summer. It would be to the working-man a more pleasurable resort than the corner-grocery, for in the smoking-room it would have clean card-tables and clean cards, where seven-up could be played for tobacco, or coffee, and would educate the taste to regard coffee as palatable as bad beer or viler gin. This resort would be more agreeable to young folks, to the class from which our hoodlums come, than the places under the wharves, or in the hay-barns, or in the abandoned houses where they now rendezvous and hide. It would be more inviting than the dance-cellars or the dives, to which strangers and sailors are seduced and robbed. It would fill the place that is largely occupied by social clubs, in affording young men and women of the working classes an opportunity for social intercourse under proper conditions. Such an institution should be free and open to all who would dress cleanly and behave themselves properly. The penalty for the offense of rude or improper conduct, vulgar or unseemly language, should be exclusion. Whether a nominal entrance fee should be charged is an open question. The dominant idea and governing principle of this public resort should be to provide a place for the people, which belongs to the people, where innocent, healthful, rational, and more attractive amusements would be provided at less cost than amusements of a vicious and demoralizing character. Our idea is that organized society should recognize this taste for amusement and pleasure as a governing principle, which can be taken advantage of to keep young people from vicious ways, and old ones from the indulgence of vicious propensities. The kindergarten is a step in the right direction. It should not be left to the charity of generous men, or the toil of good women who go out into the streets and purlieus of a city to gather in and educate the children of drunken and criminal parents. It should be the duty of government, if not as an act of philanthropy, then as an act of prevention and economy. If the children who make mud-pies on Tar Flat can be withdrawn from the evil associations which surround them at three years of age, and be thus rescued from a life of idleness and crime, society will find its profit in expending some of that money for kindergarten instruction which further along it must pay for the support of industrial schools, Magdalen asylums, and prisons. If society will provide healthful recreation and innocent amusement for its young people, it will not only save many from the possibilities of temptation, but will rescue many who, when they lose the pride of social position, precipitate themselves into lives of crime. We should be glad to see an experiment tried in the direction of providing public amusement for the people. We should be glad to see it made at the sacrifice of an occasional school-house, and at the sacrifice of ever so many of our fashionable churches. We understand there is to be erected in this city a Catholic cathedral of costly magnificence. The money for its erection will come largely from the poor. We wish it could be devoted to the erection of a Roman Catholic pleasure-garden, where the poor might obtain the worth of their money in this world's comforts. We wish that half of our now unoccupied Protestant churches, one-half of our high schools, and all of our cosmopolitan schools, could be pooled into one or more institutions of the kind we have very rudely marked out. Cheap amusements are very scarce in this city—innocent and cheap are unknown. We have thousands of whiskey saloons. At Benicia and Vallejo there is one for every seven voters; one for every twenty voters throughout the entire State; and one for every sixteen voters in San Francisco. We have brothels, and gambling-hells, and billiard-rooms, and bowling-alleys, all of which are accessories to whisky. We have singing-rooms where good music is provided, but the bad-smelling waiter with his tray, dripping beer, is allowed to elbow his way among the audience to solicit patronage for the bar. We have costly and elegant churches where the souls of our rich people may be saved at tremendous salvage. We have an opera-house and theatres where we may hear Nilsson for four dollars, and an ordinary star for one dollar and a half. We have negro minstrels for a quarter of a dollar in the gallery. We have vile and dreadful melodeons, where the exhibition of lewd women, ribald wit, and awful gin may be obtained cheaply. And yet we statesmen and Christians, we of the cultured and highly moral class, we of the wealthy and prosperous stratum, we who teach Sunday-school for nice little boys and girls in clean Sunday clothes, and frown when the frolicsome hoodlum escapes from his den of misery, called home, to the sunlight of the fields on Sunday, we who pay taxes to punish crimes and support paupers, have neither the sense, the courage, nor the humanity to declare that government should prevent the sale of intoxicating drinks; nor do we interfere with those who destroy the young for money, or display business prudence enough to provide for our citizens who are unable to provide for themselves one of the prime necessities of life—viz., "Amusement."

We put forth these reflections for the consideration of our charter-makers. An opportunity is afforded for an experiment in this new direction. If our municipal law-makers could kick the skeleton of the dead Horace Hawes out from our city closet; if the Bulletin would treat all its writers to a trip to Europe, and forego that everlasting editorial of "one cent tax upon a hundred dollars"; if our good people who compose the Prison Commission, and those of our clergy who think the only thing that anybody has worth saving is his soul, would stand aside; if our young Christians would not meddle with that which they have not sense to comprehend; if our temperance people and prohibitionists would lay hold of some practical straw to save themselves from drowning in cold water; and if those who think tobacco a deadly sin would allow plain reason and good sense to have sway—if all these changes would take place, then we might secure for San Francisco this experiment. This is not the experiment made by the Cæsars, to amuse the bloody race of Rome with the fight of beasts and gladiators, or of modern Spain to provide bull-fights, or of the later Cæsars of the Latin race who build a grand opera-house to give pleasure fêtes in Paris; but it is the attempt of the colder-blooded family of the Saxon race to provide cheap, healthful, and moral recreations for its youth, and profitable entertainment to divert the leisure hours of the toiling classes, to the end that the young may not fall into temptation, or the old find it more agreeable to spend their time and money in irrational and criminal indulgences. And all this as a question of governmental economy.

Olive Logan is inexpressibly distressed because American travelers are guilty of the vulgar habit of giving shillings and half-crowns to servants, ushers, and others who have done them a service. The amiable and tuft-hunting Olive then narrates some stories told by that unmistakable thing, the "English gentleman," illustrating the amiable ignorance of certain vulgar Americans in offering gratuities to distinguished persons. For instance: "The Right Honorable James Lowther, Earl of Lonsdale, a peer of fabulous fortune," was thanked with a shilling by an American party for showing it to the House of Commons. Now, this is not so remarkable when one has observed the very common clothes and more uncommon manners of some English gentlemen, and when it is known that the Marquis of Westminster, the richest peer in England, habitually wears a colored shirt, and wears clothes which are seemingly never new, and not always clean. It is not strange when one looks over the Houses of Lords and Commons, and notes the very common-looking faces of men who dress inelegantly, who wear their bands in their breeches pockets, are uncouth in deportment, and who converse with a bronchial stammer that threatens the rupture of a blood-vessel in their vain attempt to speak English. It is not, therefore, perhaps quite so marvelous that traveling Americans should tender gratuities occasionally to English gentlemen in disguise, when we consider how successfully they do disguise themselves. We have a very lively recollection of several titled English gentlemen who have visited California. For utter and vulgar boorishness we have never seen them excelled. For clothes that were cheap, common, and unclean, they were not excelled. And if they possessed culture, refinement, and that inbred unselfishness and modesty of deportment which characterize the gentleman, they most adroitly concealed it. Of more than a score who have visited San Francisco, we recognize but three exceptions to an otherwise universal rule. We recall, as traveling companions by rail, two Oxford professors, dressed in corduroy clothes, smoking dudheens, and actually smelling bad; but then the professors of the learned universities of England are not necessarily gentlemen—they are only scholars.

Thenexttime Olive visits the ancestral home of the great house of Ripon and Grey, whose head was formerly minister at the court of Washington, we wish she would speak to his lordship, and ask him to throw open the great ruin of Fountains Abbey to the inspection of curious Americans for something less than three shillings. This great titled and wealthy aristocrat has a ticket-office in the court of his residence, from which is issued for three shillings a coupon ticket that entitles you to visit his grounds. The same thing is done at Abbotsford. You are shown through the home of Sir Walter Scott for one shilling. The palace of Holyrood and the crown jewels of Scotland are visible for three shillings. Westminster, the sacred edifice in which are entombed the bones of its illustrious dead, is a show-house—price three shillings. The Tower of London and its treasures may be seen, its glorious memories may be recalled, and its traditions recited from the parrot-tongue of a trained usher in fantastic uniform—all for three shillings. There is not, as far as our observation goes, an historic spot in all England to which the tourist must not pay an entrance fee, and, as far as our observation goes, there is not an edifice so sacred, a place so guarded, or a house so private, that for a fee it does not fly open to him who pays. We have paid our way through Europe, from one end to another, and we now recall no shrine of the Holy Roman Church, no cathedral of the English church, no mystery, and no solemn, sacred spot, which did not fly wide open for coin. We have seen the bones of the seven thousand virgins at Cologne, the anatomy of the good old Bishop and Saint, Borromeo, covered with jewels, lying in his sarcophagus of silver and crystal in the cathedral at Milan. We have seen the wood and nails of the Cross, the blood of Saint Januarius, Christ's baby-basket, the finger and wedding-ring of Santa Theresa, the bride of the risen God. We have seen the two holy springs which burst forth when Saint Paul's hand touched the ground, and the holy stairs of the house of Pontius Pilate up which Christ walked. We have seen holy relics enough to fill a bonded warehouse, and we do not recall a holy toe-nail which we did not pay to get sight of. So we say to Miss Olive: Don't you fret, my dear lady, lest we should wound the sensibilities of an occasional English gentleman by offering him a shilling which he is unwilling to take. If, for money, the government of England shows its cathedrals, royal palaces, castles, and crown jewels; if, for money, the nobility and gentry of England show their grounds, houses, and works of art; if, for money, priests of God expose their holy relics, and if, at the clink of coin, vaults, mausoleums, crypts give up the ghastly secrets of their dead, you can set it down, Miss Logan, that in England, as elsewhere, it is "money that makes the mare go"; and when next you write to the San Francisco Morning Call, dear Olive, don't you forget it.

The official vote of the State gives the following for the gubernatorial candidates: Stoneman, (D.), 90,694; Estee, (R.), 67,175; MacDonald, (Pro.), 5,772; McQuiddy, (G.), 1,020. Stoneman's majority over Estee is 22,519. Mr. Estee is in a minority of 30,311, counting the entire vote. Conkling, for Lieutenant-Governor, who was never heard of before the nominating convention, and has never been heard of since the election, beat Mr. Estee 4,475 votes. W. W. Morrow, candidate for Congress at large, leads Estee 6,564. Hunt, for Supreme Judge, beat him 6,084. Pedlar, for Secretary of State, received 6,296 more than Mr. Estee; Davies, for Controller, 6,977; Weil, for Treasurer, 6,821; Minto, for Surveyor, 6,424; Gross, for Clerk Supreme Court, 7,176; and Waterman, for Superintendent Public Instruction, 6,731 more than the Republican candidate for Governor. Mr. Estee falls behind the average of his ticket 6,396 votes. We do not print the figures to claim that the result comes from any influence of the Argonaut. It is true that, in the performance of what we conceived to be our duty, and because it afforded us the great pleasure of an immense personal gratification, we opposed his election. Mr. Boruck, in the Spirit of the Times, did the same thing. The Sacramento Record-Union, during the last days of the canvass, did the same thing. We believe there is no other Republican journal which did not give Mr. Estee its support. If we did not contribute to his defeat, we are at least entitled to the credit of having made a good guess at the drift of public opinion, when we prophesied that the manner of his nomination, and the machine whose aid he had, would drag a better man than we thought Mr. Estee to certain defeat. Under the circumstances, any Republican would have failed of an election. And the "circumstances" to which we allude are the notorious and shameful fact that the Republican party in California had fallen among thieves; that a criminal gang of political vagabonds in San Francisco, aided by the county court-house cliques, had obtained control of the party; and that the result was the most disgraceful and criminal extravagance in office. That the Republican party in California can rally from this defeat in time to give the electoral vote of this State to a Republican, is, we think, more than doubtful. If the defeat had been local we could have rallied for a Presidential election; but the same influences having produced the same results in nearly all the Republican States, the Republicans are immensely demoralized. Politicians may work themselves into the frame of mind necessary for reaction, but the great non-political rank and file are very much disposed to let the national control drift over to the Democracy. The same feeling that manifested itself in reference to our State and municipal politics, and that made good party men bolt the ticket and good Republicans abstain from voting, for the avowed purpose of punishing party-leaders, is still abroad, and the sentiment finds frequent expression that it will be better for the country to turn its administration over to the Democracy. This is the sentiment of many who love the country and who have been loyal to it; who have been good Republicans, and whose interest in its welfare is not lessened by the fact that the opportunity now presents itself to punish the criminals who have found prosperity in Republican party ranks. California Republicans have this additional discouragement. We hear of no Republican candidate for the Presidency who did not lend himself to the Chinese conspiracy. Senators Logan, Sherman, Windom, Harrison—in fact, each senator who may be regarded as eligible for the Presidential nomination, has rendered it impossible for us to give him our electoral vote, because of his attitude upon this question. However, two years is a long time. Ever so many things are liable to occur within two years. Two years is a very long time for the Democracy to behave itself, especially when it has such a city as San Francisco and such a State as California under its unquestioned control. Two years is a sufficient period for the Republican party to become very penitent, and at least to look very sorry. We are so utterly demoralized, and so indifferent concerning the position, and so despondent at the prospects of the next Presidential election, that we most sincerely hope the Democracy will wisely, honestly, and economically administer both our city and State affairs for the full term to which it is elected.

The Record-Union gives the following facts and figures in reference to railway transportation. Upon the principal products of California, such as wool, wine, sheep, hogs, cattle, grain, hay, hops, green fruits, mill stuffs, etc., the rate of reduction of the freight-rates of railways between the years 1879 and 1880 shows an average of 13.67 per cent. Between the dates of 1879 and 1880 the reduction has been 22.69 per cent. These figures present but feebly the progress that is being made by railways in the direction of reduction. As roads multiply, as competition increases, as business extends, and population grows, these reductions will increase from year to year, till our State will find itself in the enjoyment of complete and economical railway transportation. We follow the Record-Union in noting the marvelous fact that fruits grown in the valleys of our State are supplied fresh to Eastern tables at a very slight advance over the retail price in San Francisco. It is one of the miracles of railway transportation that a cluster of grapes or a Bartlett pear grown in the valley of the Sacramento is sold in Philadelphia or New York for the same price that it is sold for in San Francisco. The oranges of Los Angeles or San Bernardino are as cheap in New Orleans as in Stockton or Sacramento. Beef grown upon our great plains of the Platte is sold fresh in London and Paris. The great prairies of Texas now supply meats to Europe. California sends fresh fruits to all the great cities of the world, while our dried fruits are the cheap luxuries of the most distant lands. Notwithstanding all the complaints of the grumbling press and all the misrepresentations of politicians, it is apparent that even in California the railway can and does compete with the ocean highway and with navigable streams. The railway brings wheat from Red Bluff to the ship or rail in San Francisco—carries passengers from San Francisco to Los Angeles; when completed to Oregon it will compete with ocean steamships; will carry wheat, and wool, and wine to the Gulf of Mexico, and send it to Liverpool in rivalry with the Horn route. Railways carry passengers and freight in every direction cheaper than any conveyance existing before their construction. The railroad-builders of California have done more good to the State, accomplished greater results in the way of increasing the business of the State, giving property value, and promoting its material progress, than all others combined. The cry against them is the howl of the hungry wolf.

A long list of proposed saints has been brought to the Sacred Congregation of Rites for beatification and canonization, says a Catholic paper. This list contains not less than two hundred and one names, of which one hundred and sixty-eight are the names of martyrs, eighty of them belonging to Corea, twenty-nine to Italy, twenty-two to France, ten to China, nine to Cochin China, five to Spain, one to Austria, and one to Poland. And not a devil of a saint for all England, Germany, or America. Only think of it, eighty saints in Corea and one in Austria; nineteen from the two Chinas, and only one in Poland. The United States of America has never had, so far as we are informed, a single saint. It is a curious business, this manufacture of saints. We are studying it up, and will be able shortly to give you just how saints are made. We desire to en-

The Alleged Humorists.

The Siren and the Sucker.

"And do you discard me forever, Gertrude Gilhooley?"

"I do," was the answer, in a low, sweet voice, while a pair of soft, brown eyes, suffused with tears, looked tenderly up at Sebastian McCarthy. "You know that my heart is yours, and that I would gladly give thee my hand, but papa says nay, and when he twitters the procession is apt to move." And, saying this, the girl buried her face in her hands and sobbed convulsively.

"But think again, Gertrude," said the young man, in eager, anxious tones. "See if thy woman wit may not discover aught that will avail to make our future pathway bright. I have loved you too long, too earnestly, to resign the prize so eagerly sought without a struggle."

"Let me think," said the Lady Gertrude, brushing back from her fair forehead the bangs which so gracefully overhung its pearly surface, and placing carefully on a toe of the statue of Mercury which stood in the conservatory a generous hunk of chewing-gum for which she had no immediate use; standing silently by a marble Psyche for a moment, she turned suddenly to Sebastian.

"You know the Mulcaheys?" she said.

"They whose moated castle frets the sky on the avenue?"

"Ay, the same."

"I do."

"Get thee thither with all speed, and when you have crossed the draw-bridge and tethered your palfrey in the terraced court, knock holdly on the front door, but relax not your vigilance, an you love me, for the Mulcaheys come of Norman blood and keep a dog. When the portal shall be opened, and you are admitted to the presence of my aunt, the Lady Constance Mulcahey, say to her that her favorite niece, Gertrude, seeks her aid; that a cruel father would wed her to one she loves not. Tell her that about four o'clock to-morrow afternoon, when the sun is gilding the shot-tower, a cassocked justice of the peace will appear at Castle Mulcahey, and that I shall soon follow with my bonny bridegroom. Do you understand?"

"I am on," replied Sebastian, "and, by my halidom, the plan is a good one." And kissing Gertrude trustfully under the left ear, he went down the front steps and was soon lost to view.

"And so my pretty niece would fain marry you?"

It was the Lady Constance Mulcahey who spoke these words, and the one to whom she addressed them was Sebastian McCarthy.

"The plan is a good one," she continued, tapping gently with a broom-handle the dainty foot that peeped from beneath her robe. "The Earl is working in the suburbs this week, and I shall not hear the clank of his dinner-pail until nearly seven P. M., so that all will be over ere he comes. You may tell Gert that I will be fixed for her."

A cold, clear afternoon in the festal Christmas-tide. Up the avenue came, with merry tinkle of bell and proud prancing of blooded steeds, drawing-room horse-car No. 176. In one corner of the vehicle sat Gertrude and Sebastian, nestled close to each other, like little birds in the merry, ageish spring time. Presently the car stopped. Sebastian was on his feet at once, his face expressing plainly the indignation that swept over his soul.

"I prithee, do not leave me," said Gertrude, grasping his ulster with a convulsive clutch.

"Fear not, sweetest. I go to see what dastard has dared to stop my faithful steeds."

He soon came back, and saying, with a merry sigb, "It is a freight-train on the crossing," again clasped Gertrude to his vest. The car moved on anon, and soon the happy couple were safe in the Castle Mulcahey.

The words that bound Gertrude and Sebastian together with the silken tether of matrimony had been said, and the happy groom had planted on the lips of his bride a large three-story-and-hasement nuptial kiss, when suddenly the door was opened, and Pythagoras Gilhooley, Duke of Galway, stood before the happy couple.

"Forgive me, father," said Gertrude, placing her soft, white arms about his neck, and looking wistfully into his eyes.

Removing from his mouth a two-inch pipe, and setting his dinner pail on the étagère, the Duke of Galway said, in clear, calm tones:

"Yez are all forgiven. Divil a much I care if ye were jined a year ago," and with these words, he silently took a chew of hard tobacco, and was gone.—Joseph Medill in the Chicago Tribune.

Society Note.

A coolness has arisen between Kosciusko Murphy and Mrs. Hufnagel, one of the most fashionable ladies of Austin. There was a lawn party at the Hufnagel mansion. Mrs. Hufnagel showed Mr. Murphy over the grounds, and asked him what he thought of their arrangement. "I am delighted, madam," was the reply; "wherever I go I see the footprints of your genius." As Mrs. Hufnagel has a foot almost as big as a wheelbarrow, she supposed there was something personal in the remark. She did not hint exactly that she was not glad to have him stay to supper, but she opened the gate and pointed into the street, and Murphy (who is very sensitive) strolled away.—Texas Siftings.

The Western Editor.

A Western editor received a letter from an indignant subscriber, who said: "I don't want your paper any longer." To which the editor mildly replied: "That is all right. I will make it any longer if you did, because in that case I have to buy a new press. The present length just suits me, and I am glad it suits you." It is to be hoped this answer turned away wrath.

Bill Nye and Lydia Pinkham have Broken the Tie.

I have just received a letter from my friend Bill Nye, of the Laramie City Boomerang, wherein he informs me that he is engaged to the beautiful and accomplished Lydia E. Pinkham, of "Vegetable Compound" fame, and that the wedding will take place on Christmas.—The Bohemian.

We are sorry to say that the above letter, which we dashed off in a careless moment, has been placed before the public, as later developments have entirely changed the aspect of the matter, the engagement between ourself and Lydia having been rudely broken by the young lady herself. She has returned the solitaire filled-ring, and henceforth we can be nothing more to each other than friends. The promise which bid fair to yield so much joy in the future has been ruthlessly yanked asunder, and two young hearts must bleed through the coming years. Far be it from us to say aught that would reflect upon the record of Miss Pinkham. It would only imperil her chances in the future, and deny her the sweet satisfaction of gathering in another guileless sucker like us. The truth, however, can no longer be evaded, that Lydia is no longer young. She is now in the sere and yellow leaf. The gurgle of girlhood and the romping, careless grace of her childhood are matters of ancient history alone. We might go on and tell how one thing brought on another, till the quarrel occurred, and hot words and an assault and battery led to this estrangement, but we will not do it. It would be wrong for a great, strong man to take advantage of his strength and the public press to speak disparagingly of a young thing like Lyd. No matter how unreasonably she may have treated us, we are dumb and silent on this point. Journalists who have been invited, and have purchased costly wedding presents, may ship the presents by express, prepaid, and we will accept them, and struggle along with our first great heart-trouble, while Lydia goes on in her mad career.—Boomerang.

Another.

[What might have been seen in the obituary column of the Tonawanda Tocsin.]

We are deeply pained to announce the loss of our promising young friend and fellow-townsmen, Mr. Jahez C. Pennifeather, the son of our esteemed contributor, Deacon Pennifeather, whose emporium on Main Street enjoys an enviable popularity, which arises not only from the high commercial quality of the deacon's goods, but from that liberal spirit of business enterprise which has always characterized this pillar of the Second M. E. Church, and which is nowhere better exemplified than in the column announcement which appears on the last page of this week's Tocsin, directly following reading-matter. Readers who have for many years taken pleasure in perusing this large and artistically worded advertisement will observe that even in this hour of grief and bereavement, Deacon Pennifeather's sense of duty to the public of Tonawanda moves him to sacrifice the man to the merchant; and the emporium will be closed only between the hours of twelve and one o'clock P. M., during which time the funeral of his lamented son will take place, as per announcement under head of "Deaths and Marriages." In Mr. Jahez C. Pennifeather this community has lost a member who gave promise of reflecting great credit on the town of Tonawanda, and adding a new lustre to the fame which our beloved burgh has already achieved throughout the length and breadth of the State. A young life is blotted out, a golden sunrise is quenched in the murky clouds of a premature night, the potentiality of an illustrious citizen is hopelessly annihilated beyond all possibility of resurrection, and a gloom is cast over a happy household of which he was the joy and pride, as well as a most assiduous helper in his father's popular emporium. Although but a young man—having cast his maiden vote at the last election for the grand old party whose sons cling to her in the hour of defeat as nobly as in the days of victory—Mr. Jahez C. Pennifeather had already evinced a notable degree of business ability, and had developed a sweet and touching character and a principle far beyond his years. As an illustration of both of these qualities, we may refer to the pleasure experienced by his friends in beholding him on the anxious seat at the recent revival in the Second M. E. Church, and to the keen financial eye which he displayed in securing the two-acre lot on the canal, which was formerly the property of the widow Dolliver, and which Deacon Pennifeather has since sold at two hundred per cent. advance on the purchase price. What makes the sudden and unexpected taking-off of our young townsman the more sad is the fact that he had but recently entered into the holy bonds of matrimony with a most estimable and attractive young lady from Toughakawaska, Miss Mehitabel Hostetter. The young couple were, indeed, on their wedding tour when death gently heckoned them both to his arms, and it was only by the exertions of several talented physicians that the fair bride was prevented from obeying the summons, and was fairly snatched from the arms of the relentless destroyer. Trusting and confident, they had gone down to the modern Babylon—the great city of New York—not to share in its lurid dissipations, for both were young people of high moral training and strict abstainers on principle, but to study its noble monuments, and pace hand-in-hand through its museums and its libraries. Repairing to a temperance hotel of well-known and high reputation, they retired at an early hour and hlew out the gas.—Puck.

Another Affair.

"I have come in to kill you," said a man entering an Arkansas newspaper office, drawing a pistol, and confronting the editor; "you published an article derogatory to my character, and it is my duty as a husband and father to kill you." "I am glad of it," the poor editor replied; "I was thinking of committing suicide." "Well, if that's the case let's go down and take something." "Now you move me to emotion," and the two deadly enemies went out together. And yet some people are in favor of prohibition.—Arkansas Traveler.

Science and Sole.

"Wonderful," said Professor Pippendorf, "are the discoveries of Science. The eagle eye of Science, gentlemen, enables me to say that this gigantic foot-print which we have just discovered was unquestionably made in prehistoric ages—in the Jurassic period, in fact—by that enormous monster which I, gentleman, have had the honor of discovering—the Monster Mastodon Muskrat, or Mus Craticus Gigans, which"—

"Which didn't make 'em," broke in Professor Gripsacque, with a snarl. "Maybe those foot-prints weren't made in the post-triassic period—my own discovery—my private discovery—by the Mastodon Duckkilled Platypus of the period—another discovery which belonged to me—my own private property."

"You thought it," returned Professor Pippendorf, "off a husted scientist in Waukegan, Michigan."

"If I may be allowed to express an opinion," mildly interposed Dr. Gunderop, the author of "The Fairyland of Science," and other works; "if I may be allowed to express an opinion, I will say that, without taking a too romantic view of the subject, it seems to me that this is probably the well-known Hippogriff, so long, though erroneously, supposed to be a fabled animal. Here is clearly the mark of the Hippo, while the Griff is distinctly indicated at the other end."

And the good doctor took off his eye-glasses and put on his spectacles to examine the marvel.

"Hippogriff!" snorted Professor Pippendorf, disdainfully. "Hippogriff your respected grandmother," sneered the sarcastic Professor Gripsacque.

"Well, gentlemen," said the doctor, meekly, "I certainly thought I observed traces of the Griff—or, well, perhaps it was the Hippo that deceived me." And he sighed sadly.

"Suppose, gentlemen," suggested Professor Pippendorf, "we move on and follow the tracks up. We may find the skeleton of the mighty wonder of the Jurassic period."

"Jurassic your aunt's second cousin!" howled Professor Gripsacque: "Post-triassic and no nonsense, neither. And if any gentleman here wants to take off his coat, and settle it right here, in the interests of science, I'm his philosophical hairpin!"

"I think we had better follow up the tracks," said Doctor Gunderop.

* * * * *

"Yes, I am sure that Reginald loves me." The chilly splendor of the late December day was fading in the west as these words dropped from Reine McCloskey's lips. The fair girl was walking with hurried footsteps along the high road that led from the hustling city of Chicago to her ancestral halls, in Coastcliff Castle. As she walked briskly on her way, in spite of the effects of the recent thaw, which had made the roadway as tender as a porous plaster culled in the dreamy days of July, it was not the breeze alone that brought the flush to her velvet cheek and the brightness to her eye. Reine McCloskey was entering that delicious period which comes to crown the life of every girl, and which ends like a happy dream in the sweet and strong luxuriance of womanhood.

"Yes," she said, quickening her pace, and her feet seemed to touch the earth more lightly as the thought brought the peach-bloom to her cheeks; "I am sure he loves me. But I would give a chromo and seventeen cents to know why those three old buffers are trailing me. Is it?—and her eyes grew more brightly tender; "is it a mash?"

* * * * *

When morning dawned the early Chicago milkman found three inanimate forms lying in a deep depression in front of Coastcliff Castle. Reine McCloskey's fairy footfall had done its fatal work.—Puck.

When Dignity Works All Right.

Colonel Ingersoll said at Omaha the other day that he hated a dignified man, and that he never knew one who had a particle of sense; that such men never learned, and were constantly forgetting something. Josh Billings says that gravity is no more the sign of mental strength than a paper collar is the evidence of a shirt.

This leads us to say that the man who ranks as a dignified snoozer, and banks on winning wealth and a deathless name through this one source of strength, is in the most unenviable position we know. Dignity does not draw. It answers in place of intellectual tone for twenty minutes, but after a while it fails to get there. Dignity works all right in a wooden Indian or a drum-major; but the man who desires to draw a salary through life and to be sure of a visible means of support will do well to make some other provision than a haughty look and an air of patronage. Colonel Ingersoll may be wrong in the matter of future punishment, but his head is pretty level on the dignity question. Dignity works all right with a man who is worth a million dollars, and has some doubts about his suspenders; but with the man who is to get a large sum of money before he dies, and get married, and accomplish some good, must place himself before his fellow-men in the attitude of one who has ideas that are not too lonely and isolated.

Let us therefore aim higher than simply to appear cold and austere. Let us study to aid in the advancement of humanity and the increase of haled information. Let us struggle to advance and improve the world, even though in doing so we may get into ungraceful positions, and at times look otherwise than pretty. Thus we shall get over the ground, and though we may do it in the eccentric style of the camel, we will get there, as we said before, and we will have camped and eaten our supper while the graceful and dignified pedestrian lingers along the trail.

Works, not good clothes and dignity, are the grand hailing sign, and he who halts, and refuses to jump over an obstacle because he may not do it so as to appear as a gazelle, will not arrive until the festivities are over.—Bill Nye.

Literary Notes.

THE PERSONAL AND MISCELLANEOUS GOSSIP OF THE LITERARY WORLD.

NEW BOOKS.

We have received such a number of holiday books that space does not suffice to give them merited attention, and we shall have to pass them by with but a cursory notice.

Mrs. Oliphant's exquisite story, "A Little Pilgrim," has been reprinted from McMillan's Magazine. Published by Roberts Brothers, Boston; for sale by Bancroft; price, 75 cents.

"The Winners in Life's Race" is a clear and comprehensive review of the vertebrate animals, by Arabella B. Buckley. Published by D. Appleton & Co., New York; for sale by Doxey & Co.

The same firm have published, in their "Young Folks' History Series," a short and well-written life of "Drake, the Devon Sea-King," by George M. Towle. For sale by C. Beach; price, $1.25.

Mrs. R. F. Kaufmann, of this city, has prepared a most admirable history of "The Queens of England," basing her work on Mrs. Strickland's famous books. Published in three volumes by Estes & Lauriat, Boston.

"Songs of Lake Geneva, and Other Poems," is the title of a volume of mediocre verse, by J. B. Kaye. The metre is frequently bad, and the taste more frequently execrable. Published by G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York; for sale by Bancroft; price, $1.30.

"Life, Death, and Other Poems" is the title of a book of verse by George H. Calvert. As the Atlantic once said of a somewhat similar collection, the poems are "not necessary." Published by Lee & Shepard, Boston; for sale by Bancroft; price, $1.50.

The fourth edition of Harvey Rice's volume of poems, which bears the title of one of their number, "Mount Vernon," appears in a handsome binding, with numerous well-executed wood engravings. Published by Lee & Shepard, Boston; for sale by Bancroft; price, $3.

The "House that Jack Built" is a volume of the collected papers on home architecture which E. C. Gardner recently published in Our Continent. It is excellently prepared, and has numerous illustrations. Published by Fords, Howard & Hulbert, New York; for sale by Bancroft; price, $1.50.

"The Knockabout Club Along Shore" is the latest of C. A. Stephens's popular stories of travel for the young. This time he takes a number of boys up the coast of Labrador and Newfoundland to Greenland and Iceland. Published by Estes & Lauriat, Boston; for sale by C. Beach; price, $1.50.

The latest number of the "Kaaterskill Series" is "The Modern Hagar," by Charles M. Clay, author of the popular "Baby Rue." It is a story of strong plot and dramatic setting. Published in two volumes by G. W. Harlan, New York; for sale by Billings, Harbourn & Co.; price, $2.00.

The pages of Harper's Young People, with its charming stories and pictures, have been delighting juvenile readers all the year, from week to week. They now appear bound uniformly with last year's volume, and will form one of the most attractive of the coming Christmas gifts. For sale by Bancroft; price, $3.

George Bartlett is always planning amusements for children, either in the tableau or charade way, or else in sports and plays. He has now issued a volume entitled "New Games for Parlor and Lawn," which will successfully effect its mission. Published by Harper & Brothers, New York; for sale by Bancroft; price, $1.

The "Bryant Birthday Book," arranged by Janet Ruutz-Rees, is another of that delightful series which has for some time been collecting for us the best thoughts of most of our great writers, in dainty and convenient form. Published by D. Appleton & Co., New York; for sale by Doxey & Co., 23 Dupont Street.

"Building the Nation" is an excellent child's history of events in the United States from the Revolution to the civil war. It is profusely illustrated, and its author, Charles C. Coffin, already has the reputation of being one of the best story-tellers. Published by Harper & Brothers, New York; for sale by Bancroft; price, $3.

Mrs. Lillie, whose articles on England in Harper's Magazine, and æsthetic story, "Prudence," have attracted such attention the past two years, has ventured into the juvenile field, and produces a book of pretty stories with the title, "Mildred's Bargain." Published by Harper & Brothers, New York; for sale by Bancroft; price, $1.

Macmillan & Co., of London and New York, have recently been publishing cheap six-penny editions of standard authors. The paper numbers of Washington Irving's "Bracebridge Hall" and "Old Christmas" are printed in far better style than any similar American publications, while the illustrations are surprising in their originality and design. For sale by Bancroft.

Edward Everett Hale has just issued another of his useful children's books. It is entitled, "Stories of Discoveries, as told by Discoverers." It deals with Columbus, Da Gama, Drake, the Atlantic and Pacific discoveries, the Northwest Passage, the Nile, the Antarctic Continent, and numerous other interesting topics. Published by Roberts Brothers, Boston; for sale by Bancroft; price, $1.

Henry Watterson, the well-known editor of the Louisville Courier-Journal, has prepared a volume of sketches, entitled "Oddities in Southern Life and Character." It consists of different tales and episodes, written up by Southern writers, to which have been added pithy notes and comments by Mr. Watterson. Published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston; for sale by Bancroft; price, $1.50.

Lee & Shepard, of Boston, have issued two handsome volumes: Tenyson's "Ring out, Wild Bells," illustrated by Miss L. E. Humphrey, and Rose Hartwick Thorpe's poem, "Curfew must not Ring To-night," illustrated by T. J. Merrill and E. H. Garrett. The work done on these books is elaborate and well befits the subjects. For sale by Doxey & Co., 23 Dupont Street; price of each, $1.50.

"The Wife's Manual," by Rev. W. Culvert, rector of St. Antholin's, and a minor canon of St. Paul's, is an English book, reprinted by Roberts Brothers, of Boston, in imitation of a volume of the sixteenth century. Its pages contain beautiful border ornamentation, and the cover is of parchment. The poems are written after the style of Heber and George Herbert. For sale by Bancroft; price, $2.25.

Walter Crane, the well-known English artist, has selected the choicest of the German "Household Stories" of the Grimm Brothers, and, aided by his sister, Lucy Crane, who did the translating, issues them with a setting of elaborate and æsthetic illustrations. The designs are fully up to the artist's best work, although coloring would have been an addition to their charm. Published by Macmillan & Co., London and New York; for sale by Bancroft; price, $2.

"Hours with Art and Artists" is an elaborately gotten-up volume by G. W. Sheldon, author of "American Painters." It deals entirely with modern painters, and treats of the French, English, German, and American schools. There are nearly one hundred and fifty engravings on wood and steel. Each is chosen to represent the best work of the artist who is being discussed, and in many instances several illustrations are devoted to one artist. The biographies given are short, but as complete as can be expected, while the more celebrated paintings of each artist are enumerated and described. The volume is large, and elegantly bound, forming a very appropriate holiday book. Published by D. Appleton & Co., New York; for sale by James T. White & Co., 23 Dupont Street.

The long-looked-for "Selections from Robert Herrick," illustrated by Edwin A. Abbey, is finally out. It may certainly be given the palm over all other American books of this nature that have yet appeared. It opens with an admirable preface from the pen of Austin Dobson, which is printed after the fashion of the prefaces of the last two centuries, and which breathes of hills, homes, and people, with the same inspiration that guided the poet with whom he deals. Many of the engravings have already made their appearance in Harper's Monthly; but their reclamation from a cramped magazine page setting, and the manner in which they have been clothed in the sumptuous livery of a two-inch margin, with the thickest of gold-edged paper, will be hailed with pleasure by every art-lover. It is needless to describe at length these exquisite pictures of the talented New York artist, Abbey. Each one is a gem in itself—from the "Mad Maid" to the "Tinker's Song." Published by Harper & Brothers; for sale by Bancroft; price, $7.50.

We have received a number of handsomely bound Christmas books from Messrs. Cassell, Petter, Galpin & Co., of London and New York: "Fred Bradford's Debt" is another of those interesting juvenile stories by Joanna Matthews, of the "Bessie Books" fame; price, $1.25. "Little Folks" is a children's magazine which is issued monthly. It possesses many illustrations and choice reading matter. The publishers have issued the numbers for 1882 in a gay binding, with colored frontispiece; price, $1.25. Charles Dickens's charming juvenile story, "Boots at the Holly-tree Inn," is issued in an elaborate dress, with numerous original designs by J. C. Beard; price, $1.50. A pretty story by Mrs. Henry D. Brine, deals with the adventures of "Papa's Little Daughter." It is profusely illustrated; price, $1.25. Do-Dee is a magazine for the youngest readers; printed in large type, and with attractive pictures on nearly every page; price, $1.00. "The Changing Year" is a gift-book made up of poems and pictures of life and nature. It is illustrated by many well-known English artists. The poetry relates mostly to scenes in pastoral life and romance; price, $3.00. "Wild Animals and Birds" is an illustrated treatise by Dr. Andrew Wilson, upon the haunts and habits of the most important types of the different mammalia and birds; price, $3.00. All these books are for sale by Bancroft.

William Hamilton Gibson when a lad neglected every other study for the pursuit of art. From early childhood the pencil was continually in his hand, and landscapes and faces were transferred to paper with art hand. For a number of years he has been the chief landscape artist on the unequalled staff of Harper's Magazine. His illustrated papers from month to month have been inspired by nature in her many different garbs from January to December. His articles have twice before been collected in superb book-form, and now he has issued a third volume, comprising four papers which have appeared in Harper's Magazine during 1882. The book is entitled "Highways and Byways," and comprises "Along the Road," "The Squirrel's Highway," "Across Lots," and "Among our Footprints." With magic genius Mr. Gibson has essayed to portray the hitherto most unapproachable effects of light and shade, forest and meadow, stream and hillside, and he has succeeded in the daring task. Who ever thought to see transferred to paper the feathery flakes of snow which sway down the pine boughs? Or what hand ever before set upon the book's page a spider's web whose gossamer lace trembles with starry dew. There is in Mr. Gibson's work none of those touches which Paris studio slang dubs "chic." Every blade or tendril has its original in nature. The cover is a study in itself, and represents a large spray of full-blown golden pussy-willow, thrown upon a field of sombre green. Published by Harper & Brothers, New York. For sale by Bancroft.

MISCELLANY.

"Court Life below Stairs," to be published by Hurst & Blackett, will describe London under the first Georges.

Science, the new illustrated weekly, will make its first appearance in Cambridge early next month. The leading scientific men of the country will contribute to its pages.

Mr. Clark Russell's new novel, "A Sea-Queen," is to appear first in this country in the pages of Harper's Weekly. William Black's "Yoland" will be published first in the Bazar.

Mr. Austin Dobson's poem in the next Harper—"a proper new ballad of the country and the town"—chants most daintily the charms of "Phyllida, my Phyllida," a buxom rustic maiden.

Two novelties in the publishing trade are mentioned in the London journals. One is the printing throughout in brown ink of a new edition of Miss Austin's works, and of Fanny Kemble's notes on Shakespeare's plays; the other is the bringing out of books in covers of various sorts of wood.

Mr. Henry Grey, known in England as the editor of a series of "Classics for the Million," has published, through Griffith & Farran, a "Key to All the Waverley Novels, in Chronological Sequence." A table is given of the leading characters in each story, and the plot is set forth as briefly and as clearly as possible. As these thirty-two novels fill ten thousand closely-printed pages, it is unnecessary to insist on the usefulness of such a pamphlet.

In an article treating of what it calls the British "pig-headed obstinacy for running in grooves," the London Globe says: "Up to the date of the naturalization of the two American magazines, Scribner's and Harper's, the woodcuts in English magazines were simply ludicrous. We had got into a groove of illustration, and the public, faute de mieux, were forced to be contented with it; but when the above-named American magazines appeared, and the public saw what could be got at the same price, there was an outcry, and consequent reform in the right direction is everywhere apparent."

PERSONALS.

The Boston Advertiser talks about "the feminized social atmosphere of Howells and James."

An illustrated "Pedigree of the Devil," by Mr. A. T. Hall, is about to be published in London.

Mr. George W. Cable will begin his history of the Louisiana creoles in the forthcoming number of the Century.

Miss Louisa Alcott has been forbidden to write by her physician. Her last volume is made up of stories collected from the magazines—only one, "The Baron's Gloves," being new.

Lord Otho Fitzgerald, the handsome young Englishman who died of blood-poisoning the other day, is said to have been the original of the agreeable nobleman in Mr. Henry James's novel of "The Portrait of a Lady."

The frontispiece of the February Century will be a portrait of Mr. George William Curtis. The accompanying biographical sketch is to be by Mr. S. S. Conant, who has for many years been intimately associated with Mr. Curtis on Harper's Weekly.

Mr. Ruskin expresses himself as greatly disappointed at having received no response to his public appeal for funds to purchase some of the MSS. at the Hamilton Collection sale for the St. George's Museum at Wakeley, Sheffield. He is now on the Continent superintending the work of three artists he has engaged to make copies by eminent masters for the museum.

Mr. F. J. Stimson, says the New York Tribune, a young Boston lawyer, is thought to be the author of the successful novel, "Guerndale." The versatile Clarence King is mentioned as the author of "Democracy." Those acquainted with Mr. King's trenchant yet delicate work know that he is quite capable of writing a brilliant novel—but he did not write "Democracy" for all that.

Bayard Taylor, one day, in the course of a conversation with Longfellow, said to the elder poet: "There is a little poem of yours which is hardly known, which few people ever mention; but of all your shorter poems it is my favorite." Mr. Longfellow's eyes kindled. "Is it 'Chrysaor'?" he asked. He was right; it was "Chrysaor," and his quick question seems to show that it was also his favorite.

Mr. Walter Besant is secretary to the Palestine Exploration Fund, and the late Mr. Rice was London editor of the Toronto Globe. When their novels began to command high prices it was suggested that they should give up these vocations and devote themselves to fiction. Mr. Rice replied that they should continue their more practical work on the ground that they liked to be perfectly independent of the public taste and of publishers.

Mr. Emerson was troubled with amnesia, though his poetical faculty was unclouded. Mr. Alcott used frequently to pay Emerson a morning visit, during which the latter would discourse eloquently of lofty themes. Mr. Alcott would drink it all in, and then return in the afternoon and pour it out in scarcely less transcendental style. And Mr. Emerson, quite unconsciously, would exclaim: "What a wonderful mind my friend over the way has."

Victor Hugo's real kindness of heart is illustrated in a story told of Pierre Dupont, the poet. When the latter arrived in Paris, poor and half starved, he applied for assistance to Hugo, and was repulsed at the door by a stern servant. Taking a card and pencil from his pocket, he wrote a little poem, in which he compared himself to a flower perishing with thirst and asking for water, and a starving swallow beating his wings against the window. This poem he asked the servant to deliver to Hugo, and was walking away, when the elder poet sent a messenger to bring him back. He stammered his apologies, but was gently interrupted with the remark: "You are one of us, and you may look on me as an elder brother." And straightway Hugo found employment for the young writer. It is kindness such as this that endears Hugo to his guild.

At a recent social gathering in Boston the conversation was upon literature, and somebody chanced to mention the saying about a prophet's lack of honor in his own country. "Yes," remarked Mr. J. T. Trowbridge, "I know all about that. The tax-collector called upon me last spring, and in the course of conversation asked me what I did for a living. I said I wrote, and after having to explain to him that I was neither a book-keeper nor a copyist, I told him I wrote books. 'Pshaw, now,' said he, 'I want to know! Wa-l, it's kind o' curious I never heard o' that. Got any o' 'em about yer?' I said I had some of them in the house, but I didn't keep a very large supply on hand. 'Well, you can git 'em, I s'pose?' was the next remark. I said I could, and he gave me an order on the spot. 'Send me down the handsomest copy you've got,' said he, 'and I'll pay you for it. If we've got a nian that kin write, I'll do my duty by him.'"

The volume of Miss Mitford's correspondence contains that lively lady's version of Carlyle's conversation with J. T. Fields concerning Washington. "So, sir, ye're an American?" quoth the self-sufficient Scotchman. Mr. Fields assented. "Ah, that's a wretched nation of your ain. It's all wrong. It always has been wrong from the vera beginning. That grete mon o' yours—George (did any one under the sun ever dream of calling Washington George before?)—your grete mon George was a monstrous bore, and wants taking down a few hundred pegs." "Really, Mr. Carlyle," replied Mr. Fields, "you are the last man in the world from whom I should have expected such an observation. Look at your own book on Cromwell! What was Washington but Cromwell without his personal ambition and without his fanaticism?" "Eh, sir," responded Carlyle, "George had neither ambition nor religion, nor any good quality under the sun—George was just Oliver with all the juices squeezed out."

A biography of Hans Christian Andersen, lately published in Copenhagen, contains a number of letters from the Danish writer which curiously portray his excessively nervous temperament. In every letter be alludes to his escape from some danger, real or imaginary. For instance, when only fifteen years old, he wrote an account of his first journey by carriage across the Island of Zealand, which, he adds, "was not without danger, for the road went up and down hill several times." And throughout his letters he is forever alluding to dangers of equal magnitude. Although of a healthy, if not robust, physique, Andersen never dispatched a letter without alluding to some ailment from which he was suffering, until it passed into quite a joke among his friends; but the most amusing feature which this nervousness produced in Hans Andersen was a perpetual fear of being buried alive, so that when he went to bed at night he always placed by his bedside a paper on which he had written, "I am only apparently dead."

—HERRMANN, THE WELL-KNOWN HATTER OF 335 Kearny Street, has just issued his semi-annual catalogue for the current season. It contains designs of all the latest styles of head-covering, and is also diversified by pictures of local scenery, well-known actors, painters, etc. In the beginning are full directions concerning hat-measuring and the procuring of goods by mail. There is no house in the city that equals Herrmann's, in either quantity, quality, or variety.

—MR. GEORGE F. ROBERTS, THE NOTED CANDY manufacturer, has, for several weeks past, been preparing the most delicious bonbons for the Christmas season. An immense assortment of confectionery rarities arrived last week from Paris, and may now be inspected at his manufactory, northwest corner Polk and Bush streets. Mr. Roberts's talent for original designs and recipes in the candy line has rendered him celebrated all over the coast.

—OVERWORKED MEN AND WOMEN, PERSONS OF sedentary habits, and others whose system needs recuperation, nerves toned, and muscles strengthened, should use Brown's Iron Bitters.

—WOMEN THAT HAVE BEEN BEDRIDDEN FOR years have been completely cured by the use of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

—NO HAIR PREPARATION IN THE WORLD HAS attained such a world-wide reputation as Ayer's Hair Vigor. This is due to its healthy action on the hair and scalp, and its remarkable power of restoring gray hair to its original color, and imparting a gloss and freshness which makes it so desirable to all classes and conditions of people.

—$4.00 FAIRY SEWING MACHINES, PRACTICAL, cheap, durable; greatest bargains; every one warranted. Secure one ere it is too late, or the supply is exhausted. Read carefully the announcement of Messrs. E. G. Rideout & Co. in this issue.

—COMPLIMENTARY NOTICE.—WE DESIRE TO call attention to the advertisement in another column of D. M. Ferry & Co., Detroit, Michigan, the great seedsmen, whose mammoth establishment is one of the sights of the chief city of Michigan. They do the largest business in their trade in the United States, reaching even across the Atlantic and Pacific oceans. The house is entirely reliable, and if you wish to get exactly what you order, you can not do better than to send to them for your seeds, and you may depend upon it, you will get the best that the market can supply. Their seeds have become known over the entire civilized world for purity and fertility, and have gained for them an enviable reputation. Their Annual Seed Catalogue, just issued for 1883, replete with information and beautifully illustrated, will be sent free on application.

CONSUMPTION CURED.

AN OLD PHYSICIAN, retired from practice, having had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure for Consumption, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Asthma, and all Throat and Lung Affections, also a positive and radical cure for Nervous Debility and all Nervous Complaints, after having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, has felt it his duty to make it known to his suffering fellows. Actuated by this motive and a desire to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge, to all who desire it, this recipe, in German, French, or English, with full directions for preparing and using. Sent by mail by addressing with stamp, naming this paper, W. A. NOYES, 149 Power's Block, Rochester, New York.

—WOULD NOT BE WITHOUT REDDING'S RUSSIA Salve, is the verdict of all who use it. Price 25c.

—STINGING IRRITATION, INFLAMMATION, ALL Kidney Complaints, cured by "Buchupaiba." 5c.

—WELLS' "ROUGH ON CORNS." 15c. Ask for it. Complete, permanent cure. Corns, warts, bunions.

—USE SOUTH PRAIRIE COAL.

—LADY READERS OF THE ARGONAUT WILL remember that the place to buy colognes, perfumery, toilet soaps, brushes, sponges, cosmetics, etc., is at the elegant and well-stocked store of James G. Steele & Co., Chemists and Apothecaries, 635 Market Street, Palace Hotel, San Francisco.

—THE ONLY HOUSE IN THE CITY WHERE THE best, freshest, and purest candies may be obtained is the manufactory of G. F. Roberts, corner Polk and Bush streets. Mr. Roberts is constantly inventing the choicest bon-bons, and has prepared for the holiday season a vast number of various delicious and original confectionery concoits. Besides this he has just received, direct from Paris, a stock of French bonbonnières.

—MORSE HAS THE FINEST GALLERY IN THE world, 826 Market Street, (Phelan Block).

—HEADQUARTERS FOR ELECTRIC BELTS, AND appliances for the cure of nervous, painful, and debilitating diseases. Pamphlets, with full particulars, free. Address PULVERMACHER GALVANIC COMPANY, 513 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Cal.

ATTRACTIONS!

Our selections for the coming Holidays are exceptionally fine, and embrace the largest assortment of articles pertaining to the DIAMOND, WATCH, JEWELRY, and SILVERWARE business to be found in the State, and we are selling at close prices. All goods are marked in plain figures, from which no deviation is made.

GEO. C. SHREVE & CO.

110 MONTGOMERY STREET.

Books

MAKE THE BEST HOLIDAY PRESENTS.

THE FINEST DISPLAY IN THE CITY OF

NEW YEAR CARDS

—AT—

DOXEY & CO.

23 DUPONT STREET, SAN FRANCISCO.

—RHEUMATISM, DISORDERED BLOOD, GENERAL debility, and many chronic diseases pronounced incurable, are often cured by Brown's Iron Bitters.

—Dr. E. O. COCHRANE, DENTIST, 850 MARKET cor. Stockton (over drug store.) Office hours, 9 to 5

—Go to Bradley & Rutson's New Photographic Gallery, southeast corner Geary and Dupont streets

CHRISTMAS PRESENTS!

BOY'S TOOL CHEST

No trash. We put up our own chest. All steel tools.

BOY'S BICYCLES!!

The strongest and cheapest. Call and examine.

SCROLL SAWS,
SCROLL SAW MATERIAL, MECHANICS' TOOLS,
HARDWARE.

OSBORN & ALEXANDER,

628 Market St., opp. Palace Hotel.

THE LEADING PHOTOGRAPHER.
No. 8 MONTGOMERY STREET, . . . OPPOSITE GRAND AND PALACE HOTELS, S. F.
GOLD MEDAL AWARDED FOR THE BEST PHOTOGRAPHS.

FILIPPE'S ACADEMY OF LANGUAGES
235 KEARNY STREET

SOUTHWEST CORNER OF BUSH.
PROF. DE FILIPPE continues to give personal instruction in Spanish and French, by his easy, practical method, saving months of study. Classes and private lessons. Apply from 3 to 5 or 7 to 8 P. M.

SHERIFF'S SALE.

THE HIBERNIA SAVINGS AND LOAN SOCIETY, Plaintiff, vs. JAMES T. DOUGINE, et als., Defendant. Superior Court. Department No. 3. (Late 19th Dist. Court.) No. 6738. Order of Sale and Decree of Foreclosure.

UNDER AND BY VIRTUE OF AN

Order of Sale and Decree of Foreclosure issued out of the Superior Court, Department No. 3, of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, on the 12th day of September, A. D. 1882, in the above-entitled action, wherein The Hibernia Savings and Loan Society, the above-named plaintiff, obtained a judgment and decree of foreclosure against James T. Dougine, Mrs. James T. Dougine, his wife, and Mary A. Griswold, defendants, on the 31st day of August, A. D. 1882, which said judgment and decree was, on the 12th day of September, A. D. 1882, recorded in Judgment Book 2, of said Superior Court, at page 174, I am commanded to sell all that certain lot, piece, or parcel of land, situate, lying, and being in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and bounded and described as follows:

Commencing at a point on the easterly line of Webster Street, distant two hundred and four feet northerly from the northeasterly corner of Webster and Washington Streets; thence northerly along the easterly line of Webster Street, twenty-five feet and six inches; thence at right angles easterly eighty feet; thence at right angles southerly twenty-five feet and six inches; and thence at right angles westerly eighty feet to the point of commencement. The same being part of the parcel of land known on the official map of the Western Addition as Block No. 262.

Public notice is hereby given that on Monday, the 13th day of January, A. D. 1883, at 12 o'clock, noon, of that day, in front of the Old City Hall, in the city and county of San Francisco, I will, in obedience to said order of sale and decree of foreclosure, sell the above-described property, or so much thereof as may be necessary to raise sufficient to satisfy said judgment, with interest and costs, etc., to the highest and best bidder for gold coin of the United States. San Francisco, December 23, 1882.

JOHN SEDGWICK, Sheriff.
TODIN & TODIN, Attorneys for Plaintiff.
December 23, 30; January 6, 13.

DANICHEFF

FACTORY,

119 DUPONT ST.

KID
GLOVES.

TO ORDER OR READY MADE.

DRESS, WALKING,

THEY MAY BE EQUALED.
CAN'T BE EXCELLED.

Storyettes.

GRAVE AND GAY, EPIGRAMMATIC AND OTHERWISE.

A lady, whose ambition is to shine in the wide, wide world of literature, art, and fashion, undertakes to create a salon, and selects a reception day, but vainly does she expect a throng of celebrities—the celebrities do not come. Her lady friends feel for her, of course. "I see she has taken a reception day," says one. "No, my love, a deception day," says the other.

When Daniel O'Connell, while conducting a case before Lord Norbury, observed: "Pardon me, my lord; I am afraid your lordship does not apprehend me," the Chief-Justice, (alluding to a report that O'Connell had avoided a duel by surrendering himself to the police,) retorted: "Pardon me, also; no one is more easily apprehended than Mr. O'Connell whenever he wishes to be apprehended."

A German banker, for his services to his government in arranging a loan, is created a baron, and prepares to take a walk abroad accompanied by his son and heir. According to custom the young man respectfully takes his place on his sire's left. "You may walk on the right side," says the new baron, ceremoniously; "you have one titled ancestor more than I." And as his heir seems surprised at this statement, he adds majestically, "I am that titled ancestor, sir!"

"You mustn't touch the top of the baby's head," said a mother to her little four-year-old; "she has a soft spot there that is very tender." The youngster gazed at it curiously for a moment, and then asked: "Do all babies have soft spots on their heads?" "Yes." "Did papa have a soft spot on the top of his head when he was a baby?" "Yes," replied the mother, with a sigh, "and he has got it yet." And the old man, who had overheard the conversation from an adjoining room, sang out: "Yes, indeed, he has, my boy, or he would be a single man to-day."

At a revival meeting held in Nauvoo, on the Mississippi River, last summer, old Captain Higgins strayed into the camp-grounds, and before he knew it found himself pretty well forward among the "mourners." The captain, who has been a river pilot for over thirty years, is troubled with weak eyes, and in consequence has frequent recourse to a big red handkerchief. One of the active brethren of the meeting noticed his apparent interest in the proceedings, and thought he had hooked a convert. So he approached the old weather-beaten pilot, shook him warmly by the hand, and said: "Well, Brother Higgins, how do you feel?" "Tough; how do you pull through in this d—d hot weather?"

An ingenious clerk in the British Admiralty was asked by a gentleman with whom he had a slight acquaintance whether he might come to his room to see the recent review of the troops on their return from Egypt. "Certainly," replied the clerk. "May I bring my wife?" "Yes." "I have two daughters; may they come?" "By all means." A second time the gentleman called to ask whether a few nieces might be added to the band. To this the clerk cheerfully assented. "We can not be sufficiently grateful to you," said the gentleman, "for enabling us to have so good a view of the review." "I am afraid," answered the clerk, "that you and your family will not see very much of it, for my room looks out into a back-yard."

A queer story is told of the way in which Talleyrand became possessed of the benefice of Saint Denys de Reims. He had come to Paris with little more capital than his wit. This, however, gained him a reception everywhere. One afternoon he was at Madame Dubarry's, where a gathering of young dandies were boasting of their conquests among the fair sex. Talleyrand was abnormally quiet, and the king's favorite rallied him, saying: "Monsieur l'Abbé, what renders you so silent?" "Alas! madame, I am oppressed by a mournful reflection." "Indeed! And of what?" "That it is a good deal easier in Paris to become possessor of a mistress than benefices." Dubarry carried the bon mot to Louis XVI., and Talleyrand became Abbé of Saint Denys, with returns of eighteen thousand livres yearly.

One fine evening in the last century, says the New York World, the poet Chapelle and a French duke of his acquaintance supped together, and, having tarried long at the wine, naturally began to grow moral, to lament the brevity of this life, and to insist that nothing was more desirable than religion, which alone could purchase for them a happy hereafter. Unfortunately the prospect of devoting a whole lifetime to well-doing seemed somewhat unattractive, and both began to envy the early martyrs, who had gained a blissful immortality by a brief moment of suffering; and, having had another bottle, they resolved, with fervent tears, to go to Turkey and earn the palms of martyrdom. "We shall be taken while preaching," said the poet, "and led before the Pasha, who will command us to abjure our faith. I shall reply firmly; so will your grace. I shall be impaled; so will your grace. And there we shall be, both of us, in Paradise." "Hold on," exclaimed his companion; "as a marshal of France, duke, and peer, it will be my place to speak to the Pasha, be impaled, and go to heaven first—not a base-born clod like you!" "What the deuce do I care if you are a marshal of France, duke, and peer?" screamed the indignant poet, snapping his fingers under his grace's nose. The duke threw his plate at the poet, and the poet fell back, and the table upon both of them, and there they lay, when they were separated, and undertook that they had been fighting about.

"What sort of a servant have you now?" inquired a lady of a friend that she was visiting. "Oh, splendid!" she replied; "he's a Chinaman, and is so methodical in his habits that I know just what he is doing at any hour in the day. He is now, probably, putting away the dishes and tidying up the kitchen. Come and see if I'm right." She led the way to the kitchen, quietly opening the door, and there, in the middle of the floor, sat John Chinaman washing his feet in the dish-pan.

"Papa," said a gushing and modest young damsel of Chicago, "I want you to give me this Christmas a sealskin sacque and muff, a pair of diamond ear-rings, that beautiful writing-desk we were looking at the other day, and bushels and bushels of French candy. Will you, papa?" and the dear thing's eyes danced in glowing anticipation, while her feet beat a tattoo on the velvet carpet that sounded like muffled thunder. "Ah, my dear child," replied the proud father, as he gazed at his daughter with a pensive, upward-tendency-in-pork look, "indeed I will; just hang your stocking up in the back-yard, and I will fill it for you, darling, if I have to chuck in a house and lot."

When the Duke of Vendôme was charged with obtaining the signatures of the most important of the Spanish nobles to the declaration in favor of Philip V., several of the signers added to their names, "As noble as the king." Monsieur de Vendôme made no objection to this, being unwilling to offend any of them; but when one of them added to his signature, "As noble as the king, and a little more so," he could not repress his surprise, and said, politely: "Surely, sir, you would not cast a doubt upon the right of the House of Bourbon—the oldest in all Europe—to be regarded as noble?" "No, your grace," replied the Spaniard, "but Philip V. is French, and I have the honor of being a Castilian."

A Wisconsin man, says the Milwaukee Sun, had been injured by the cars and had sued the railroad company. The testimony for the prosecution was all in, and the defense called in a witness to prove "contributory negligence," in that the injured man did not use due caution to protect himself from injury. Counsel made a few remarks on the sin of "contributory negligence," and in his mild, sad way tried to show that really the railroad company was the injured party, when plaintiff's counsel got up, mad as a hornet, and said to the judge: "Your honor, there never is a case of this kind but the defense pleads contributory negligence, and I should not be surprised, if the heirs of Jesus Christ should bring suit against His persecutors for damages, and opposing counsel should be retained by the defense, to hear him put in the plea of contributory negligence upon the part of Christ, because He carried the cross and injured His back."

A little while ago, four bold, bad sophomores in a certain college in Maine went into the room of a freshman whom they judged to be verdant. After the sophomores had got into the room the freshman asked what they wished. "Oh, we've come to put you through," was the reply. The freshman told them they had better not attempt anything, but they scornfully refused to listen to advice from a member of a lower class, and made a rush for the youth whom they took to be green. With a blow he laid one of the bold sophs upon his back. In the mêlée that followed the light was overturned and extinguished, when the freshman grasped a chair, and the sophomores were obliged to beat a hasty and disastrous retreat. The next morning the freshman was called before the President of the college, who inquired the cause of the disturbance in his room the preceding evening. The freshman narrated the circumstances of the case very minutely, and the President listened with the greatest attention. When the freshman had finished, the President said: "And you cleaned them out?" "Yes," was the answer. "I congratulate you upon your success," said the President, as he took the boy's hand and gave it a hearty shake.

Colonel Ramsay had been but a short time in India when he was appointed aid-de-camp to the Governor of Bombay, Sir George Arthur. At the first great dinner party his brother aid-de-camp was ill, and he had to pair off the guests, all strangers to him. To make matters worse, at the last moment many of the arrangements had to be altered: "I got on very well until I came to a large, imposing-looking officer, and I said: 'Colonel D—, I believe?' He bowed assent. 'I see you are down on my list to take Miss A— down to dinner.' Sternly and briefly, he replied: 'No, sir, I will not.' I stared at him, speechless; and he said: 'Ah, I forgot; you are new on the island. That fellow D'Arcy is, I suppose, amusing himself in the jungles, so I may as well let you know I am a full colonel off pay and reckoning, and Commissary-General of the Bombay army, and my position entitles me to a married woman. I will take no miss down to dinner.' I smiled sweetly, and said: 'Colonel, I have just come from a little place called England, and there we are very fond of taking young ladies down to dinner, and the older we get, the more we like it.' 'I know nothing about England,' he replied; and off he went again—the old refrain, full colonel, commissary-general, etc., etc. I was obliged to tell him that he had been originally marked off for a married lady, but, owing to the numerous apologies, there was now none available. The next officer I came to was standing by laughing; I said: 'Colonel B—?' He bowed. I then told him how delighted I was to find that he had to take down a married lady. 'No, sir,' he said, hastily, 'I can not; I have not spoken to her for twenty years.' I was in despair. However, the two great men went down good-naturedly together."

A martinet of a sergeant turns up unexpectedly to call out a fatigue party. Only one soldier answers to the summons with promptitude. "Confound it all to confusion!" yells the irritated officer. "What in the name of a hundred thousand devils do you mean by turning out alone, sir, when I called out the whole squad? Forty-eight hours in the black-hole! That'll teach you to be the only man to turn out!"

A Cleveland man named Jones has a cow addicted to the uncomfortable habit of switching her tail in his face while milking her. The other day Jones took the tail and tied it firmly to his leg. The cow, irritated by the flies she could not drive away, started off, and feeling the curious attachment to her tail, became frightened and ran. Jones is now walking around on crutches and remarking: "About the tenth time I had been hauled around that lot I began to see where I had missed it. I oughter tied her tail to her leg, and not to mine."

"I raised seven boys," said an Arkansas man, "and all but one was killed. Tom was killed by his uncle; Ned was stabbed by Ike; Ike was horned to death by a cow; Jake was blowed up; Sim was killed by a wild hog; and Nat was flung by a horse, and killed." "What was your other son's name?" "Lige, and he was as good a boy as ever lived, and smart! That boy could write his name anywhere, and he could read big show printin'." "And so they were all killed but Lige?" "Yes," said the old man, with a sorrowful sigh. "And what became of Lige?" "Why, sir, the Governor took a fool notion and wouldn't pardon him, and he was hung."

"I had a funny experience to-day," remarked Fenderson. "I had taken my seat in the car and opened the window, when all of a sudden a fellow back of me leaned forward and said: 'I beg your pardon, sir; but did you ask me if the dust annoyed me?' I didn't know what to make of him, but I shook my head and took up my paper. Five minutes later, blamed if that chap didn't touch me on the back again, and say: 'Did you ask me if the wind was too much for me?' And I hadn't said a blessed word to him. Guess the fellow was drunk or crazy." The boys said they guessed he must have been, and then began to laugh. But Fenderson couldn't see what in time they found to laugh at.

One of the latest of French theatrical successes, "Le Truc d'Arthur," turns upon the ingenious expedient adopted by a young man desirous to elude the importunities of the sweet-heart with whom he is desirous of breaking. The idea of permitting the too faithful lady to discover that he was a footman originated with Eugène Sue. Great, naturally, was the fair one's disgust and indignation, upon calling at the novelist's dwelling, to find a strange gentleman assuring her that he was Eugène Sue, and to recognize the gay Lothario in the flunkey who brought in the coal to make the fire. "I should have known it!" sobbed the victim. "You wretch, you were so stupid all the time that I felt sure you could never have written those romances!"

That good old Bible and pistol story seems to have a new boom this fall, and it is with the utmost reluctance that we aim a blow at the venerable tradition by the following cold statement of facts. It seems that a young Deadwood City miner named Hogdon, was in the habit of frequently reading from a hymn-book, the gift of his mother, which he invariably carried in the breast-pocket of his coat. One day last week, while said garment was hanging on a bush at a little distance, a party, familiar to the reader as a typical bold, bad man, came by, appropriated the coat, and impudently put it on at once. As it contained all the exemplary youth's money, as well as the hymn-book in question, a fight was inevitable, and both men opened fire without loss of time. The bullet that should have killed the thief lodged in the hymn-book and enabled the desperado to walk off with a sacrilegious grin on his wicked countenance. The good young man was killed as dead as Guiteau. Now, what are the writers of Sunday-school books going to do about this entire new deal?

The Arabs tell a story to show how a mean man's philosophy overshoots itself. Under the reign of the first Calif there was a merchant of Bagdad equally rich and avaricious. One day he bargained with a porter to carry home for him a basket of porcelain vases for ten paras. As they went along he said to the man: "My friend, you are young and I am old; you can still earn plenty. Strike a para from your hire." "Willingly!" replied the porter. This request was repeated again and again, until, when they reached the house, the porter had only a single para to receive. As they went up-stairs the merchant said: "If you will resign the last para I will give you three pieces of advice." "Be it so," said the porter. "Well, then," said the merchant, "if any one tells you it is better to be fasting than feasting, do not believe him. If any one tells you it is better to be poor than rich, do not believe him. If any one tells you it is better to walk than ride in your carriage, do not believe him." "My dear sir," replied the astonished porter, "I knew these things before; but if you will listen to me, I will give you such advice as you never heard before." The merchant turned around, and the porter, throwing the basket down the staircase, said: "If any one tells you that one of your vases is unbroken, do not believe him." But before the merchant could reply, the porter made his escape, thus punishing his employer for his greediness.

W. W. MONTAGUE & CO.

English Portable Grate.

Grass Fire Dogs and Basket Sunflower Pattern.

Brass Coal-Hod.

MARBLEIZED MANTELS,

In Imitation of

Black Walnut, Laurel, Oak, and Rosewood.

Plain and Artistic Grates, and Fire-Places.

POLISHED BRASS Andirons, Fire
Sets, Coal-Hods and Fenders.

Tile Fire-Place.

Encaustic, Plain, Art-Painted, Glazed, and Majolica

TILES,

For Mosaic Flooring, Paving, Fire-
Places, Mantel Facings, Furniture,
Vestibule, Hearths, Walls, and other Architectural Decorations.

Brass and Tile Fender.

Brass and Tile Fender.

Brass Andirons.

Brass Fire-Set and Stand.

Normandy Andiron and Basket, Brass and Steel.

W. W. MONTAGUE & CO.

NOS. 110, 112, 114, 116, 118 BATTERY STREET,

SAN FRANCISCO

NABOB SAUCE

TRADE-MARK.

For Soups, Fish, Roasts, Steaks, Chops, Hashes.

A Most Delicious Tonic.

If you desire to make an elegant and useful CHRISTMAS GIFT, present your friend with a

WAKEFIELD RATTAN CHAIR.

This CUT represents our LADIES' ARLINGTON
ROCKER, No. 494, $8.50.

We have now in stock the finest assortment ever offered in this city. Send for Catalogue.

WAKEFIELD RATTAN CO.,
644 Market Street.

NEW YEAR'S CARDS.

The largest and finest line in the city, wholesale and retail.
Specialty made of Cards exclusively.

J. J. EVANS, STATIONER,
436 California Street.

OPEN EVENINGS.

Will be mailed free to all applicants, and to customers of last year without ordering it. It contains about 175 pages, 60 illustrations, prices, accurate descriptions and valuable directions for planting 1500 varieties of Vegetable and Flower Seeds, Plants, Fruit Trees, etc. Invaluable to all, especially to Market Gardeners. Send for it!
C.M. FERRY & CO. DETROIT MICH

"THE LITERARY CALENDAR has been carried to its highest point in the Emerson and Longfellow Calendars for 1883, published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co. The illustrations and decorations are alike admirable, and these beautiful objects in the home will be a source of elevated pleasure and monition through the year," says the New York "Christian Intelligencer." $1.00 each. Look at them in the bookstores.

 For sale by all Bookellers. Sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of price by the Publishers.

HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN & CO.,
BOSTON.

ATURE Care. Greatest Invention of the age. PIERCE & SON
704 Sac St., San Fran. Cal.

BUY THE Automatic

Because it is the BEST, and therefore the CHEAPEST;

Because perfect satisfaction is guaranteed, or, after an ownership of six months, and not over two years, a new machine of any other make will be furnished in exchange, without extra charge;

Because it is sold at ONE PRICE to all, and because NO OTHER Sewing Machine is sold with the same guaranty as above.

WILLCOX & GIBBS S. M. CO.,

124 Post Street, SAN FRANCISCO.

ESTABLISHED 1852.

PIANOS! ORGANS!

A NEW IDEA! A GENEROUS OFFER!

A Plan by which everybody can own a Piano or Organ. Small advances and easy payments.

THE PIONEER PIANO HOUSE

.....OF.....

WOODWORTH, SCHELL & CO.

Will sell you a good, first-class PIANO or ORGAN for ten per cent. of the retail price down, and ten dollars in monthly payments on Pianos, and five to eight dollars in monthly payments on Organs. Do not fail to avail yourself of this offer. Call and examine at the warerooms of

WOODWORTH, SCHELL & CO.

SOLE AGENTS FOR THE CELEBRATED

Henry F. Miller Pianos, of Boston,
Hemme & Long Upright Pianos, of San Francisco,
Grovesteen & Fuller's Pianos, of New York,
And Taylor & Farley's Organs.

105 STOCKTON ST., SAN FRANCISCO.

PIANOS TO RENT AND TUNING DONE.

ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUES MAILED TO ANY ADDRESS.

J. H. CURLEY & CO.

14 MONTGOMERY STREET, 14

OPPOSITE LICK HOUSE,

IMPORTERS OF FINE

BROADCLOTHS, CASSIMERES,
SCOTCH TWEEDS, AND BEAVERS,

AND MANUFACTURERS OF

GENTLEMEN'S FINE CLOTHING

FOR DRESS OR BUSINESS SERVICE.

Having engaged the services of F. J. LOCHER, the Artistic Cutter, are prepared to produce Clothing of Superior Style and Finish AT LOW PRICES.

TO HOUSEKEEPERS.

If you wish to use goods of full weight and absolute purity, see your grocer supplies you with

KINGSFORD'SOSWEGO*STARCH.*ROYAL*BAKING*POWDER.*WALTER BAKER & CO'S*CHOCOLATE.*SMITH*BROTHERS'*PACKAGE*BORAX.*WM. T. COLEMAN & CO.

AGENTS,

121 and 123 Market Street,
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

Tholuj: the Hanged

*NATHAN ben NATHAN, unto those that yet,
In spite of all, believe in Christ; to those Who find both time and sinews taxed to get
Daily supplies of sustenance and clothes,
Shut out by poverty and private woes
From Sabbath operas, where "better folk"
Blend chant and essay with an organ's throes
And think they worship God; to those that broke Latens kuman and divine to flee Christ's heavy yoke:*

I know not how it happened, but I know
It came to pass somehow, some time, somewhere,
That, wrecked and broken by the storms of woe,
I stranded on the desert of Despair—
A soul too dead to seek relief in prayer;
While the salt surf of bitterness did fray
All feeling, intellect, and purpose bare—
A thing so hopeless dead that where it lay
The vulture, Passion, looked, and slowly sailed away.

For from my childhood I had loved the Lord
With changeless, perfect truth and constancy
That would have braved the fagot, or the sword,
Or any form of death and agony,
To prove my faith in Him that died for me;
But the hour came when all aghast I saw
That War, and Slavery, and Usury,
The crimes that curse mankind, are crimes that draw
Their fatal strength as much from churches as from law.

With cruel certainty I saw 'twas vain
To hope "Religion" could regenerate
Our human life. Broken in heart and brain,
I sank beneath the vast and bitter weight,
Of hopeless pity for the world's sad fate.
"There is no help in Earth or Heaven!" I said;
"Jesus, the Beautiful, hath died in vain!
Man hath no refuge but the sombre shade
Of quiet, dreamless Death! Would God that I were dead!"

How long I lay in this void, pangless grief
No mortal knoweth: but at last there came
A sad-faced Angel, grand beyond belief,
Strong, quiet, beautiful, as if his name
Might be Compassion. Lovingly he came,
Lifted my wan-hope spirit tenderly
To his white, radiant breast, and like a flame,
Noiseless but bright, with waving pinions free,
Floated through starless heavens o'er mountain, vale,
and sea!

I can not tell you how the thing was done;
But it was so that as we glode through space
We also glided back through ages gone,
And soon descried a vast and wondrous place
Long centuries behind the Year of Grace.
"Behold Jerusalem!" the Angel said;
"The battle-field whereon a fallen race
Triumphed o'er Sin, and Selfishness, and Death!
Behold the Christ," he said; "Jesus of Nazareth!"

The Angel spoke and vanished. My soul stood
At lone Golgotha, in the midnight air,
Too dead to feel its own bestitude,
Too dull to think, too faithless, sick, for prayer,
Steeped to the very eyelids in despair.
In the blue midnight then I dimly saw
A Roman cross, that—rough, erect, and bare—
Stood harsh, unyielding, cruel as the law
Which ruling classes make to keep the poor in awe.

Then a white Something, terrible and stark,
Gleamed from the cross-tree, and I heard it speak
Words dropped like saintly music through the dark:
"Give me thy heart, my Son! O smitten, weak
With mighty griefs that mar thine eye and cheek,
Thou hast no refuge when the tempests rise
Save faith in me! That ark of mercy seek,
And it shall waft thee safe to Paradise,
When human efforts fail and human wisdom dies."

Then my dead soul was stung to life again,
Smitten with an ungovernable rage
And maddened by irremediable pain,
That neither love nor hatred could assuage,
And, glaring on the mild Etesian sage,
"Lo, Thou art Tholuj," said I, "and those men
Who hanged thee up were righteous in their rage.
King Herod erred with cruel wisdom when
He slew the Innocents, but did not slay Thee then!"

Then softly as dawn opens in the East
The lips of Tholuj parted tenderly,
And words came swift as singing birds released:
"Why raillest thou, poor Soul? I died for thee!
I give thee life eternal, perfect, free!
Soon fade the sorrows of this world away,
And, in the light of immortality,
Thou shalt regard them but as dreams that lay,
Heavy upon thy heart, to vanish with the day."

"Thy work hath failed, Thy Kingdom come to naught!
I hate Thee, Tholuj! Loathe, abhor, detest
The lying promise of Thy Gospel, fraught
With cunning frauds that crucify the best
And noblest spirits of a race oppressed
With its vast consciousness of sin and pain,
Which Thou didst crystallize into Unrest,
That wearies down the aching heart and brain
Yearning to live a life that man can not attain!"

"Son," answered Tholuj, gently, "if I lied,
Who speaketh truth? Whom trust if I deceive?
That is not grief that is grief sanctified,
Nor sin that is sin pardoned. They that grieve Shall yet be comforted. Thou shalt receive
The crown immortal when thy task is o'er,
And white robes which unfallen angels weave
Of purest light upon the other shore,
Where sorrow never comes, and sin is feared no more."

My spirit writhed with bitter hate and scorn:
"Thou wouldst convert the world," I answered:
"Thou,
O outcast Son of Stada, basely born,
And justly numbered with transgressors now
By that death agony upon thy brow!
Lo, I despise myself, because, misled
By thine audacity, my soul did bow
And worship Thee through all the wasted, dead,
Unprofitable years that bowed my heart and head."

"Ah, how I hate Thee, Tholuj! My glad youth
Was like a song of triumph, whose full lines
Were full of grandest prophecies of truth,
Solemn but sweet, as when the sombre pines
Breathe music to the winds from all their times.
I met Thee, and Thy strange, seductive lies
Of Faith that sanctifies, Love that refines,
And Holiness that triumphs though it dies,
Have made my life a long and useless sacrifice."

"Me Thou didst crucify unto the world
As wiser men did Thee. Before mine eyes
Nature and Youth their starry hopes unfurled—
Banners that guide to Passion's ecstasies,
To wealth, and power, and homage of the wise,
And all the prizes human life can yield;
By Thee misled, I chose the way that lies
Through pain and self-denial, sorrow-sealed,
While meaner souls enjoyed all that the earth revealed."

"Thou art a Liar, Demagogue, and Cheat!
Boasting Thy love and pity for the poor,
Thou, full of craftiness and all deceit,
Hast forged out cunning systems vastly more
Inhuman than the world had seen before,
Backing the ancient tyrannies, that made
The hearts of men faint, cowardly, and sore,
With thine eternal sanctions, that displayed
More skill than despots knew to make their slaves afraid."

"Thou sayest: 'Ye poor and heavy-laden, come,
And I will give you rest!' O Hypocrite!
Look through Thy many-peopled Christendom.
A few that are the vilest, wretches fit
For bonds and scourging only, safely sit
In the high places of their power and pride,
Saved by wise Selfishness, a gospel writ
For Scribes and Pharisees, who hate, deride
The toiling poor for whom Thou hast so vainly died!"

"Thy Church makes haste to baptize and to bless
All wrongs that felon statutes authorize.
War, Serfdom, Usury, crimes that oppress
The Common People, till it groans and dies,
Ecclesiasticism sanctifies!
They have cast out Thy gospel and proclaim Glory, and Patriotism, and other lies,
Teaching as truth, and teaching in Thy name,
Such devil-words and works as Honor, Wealth, and Fame!"

"All ye are Brethren, sayest Thou; but Thy Church
Panders to Law and Order bawds, that make
Our life a lie so vile that it would smirch
The brows of Satan; for, though Dives take
The crumbs from Lazarus, and lie awake
In purple and fine linen, to contrive
New statutes fine enough to grind and slake
The pauper's bones to gold, yet let him live,
Thy Holy Church sells Dives all she has to give."

"Mammon, that pardoned any sin for gold
Although a pirate's band might bring the bribe,
Is more a god than in the days of old.
Judas, the Financier—curse be his tribe!
Is patron-saint of Pharisee and Scribe;
And I that loved Thee, Tholuj, sought Thy grace,
Here broken-hearted greet Thee with a gibe,
And curse Thee to Thy white and awful face,
And for myself despair, and for the human race."

Then, softly as a healing breeze that blows
Across the crystal bosom of a lake,
To lovingly caress the cheeks of those Whom pestilence hath smitten, His voice broke
The midnight silence as Tholuj spake:
"And thinkest thou, my son, I have not seen
Thy life-long faithfulness that naught could shake?
Thy truth and courage that have ever been Like thine unchanging love—pure, strong, devout, serene?"

"Thou never wert deserted; of that cup
No mortal tasteth. All thy days, what time
Thou didst sift sheaves of thought to garner up
What good seed science growth in her clime,
Burning its chaff to leave thy learning prime,
Pure, nourishing, and incorruptible—
Through thy soul's patient search that went sublime
Through mysteries of earth, and heaven, and hell,
Lo, I was with and approved thy life-work well."

"For this cause have I called thee, child of grace,
Cast down but not forsaken, overweighed
With pity for the sorrows of thy race,
And righteous wrath at the injustice laid
Upon the Many by the Few, whose trade
Is but to rob and to oppress mankind.
Be thou not hopeless! Be not thou afraid!
Be steadfast! Thou a perfect cure shalt find
For social leprosy, sure skill to couch the blind."

"This cup of pain shall pass thee by, my son.
Thou never shalt forsake me, nor forget
The perfect work that hath in thee been done;
And thou shalt see my kingdom triumph yet.
For this cause I have called thee hither—set
The Man of Sorrows bereft Calvary,
That thou mightest see his very death, and get
New hope, faith, love, to fit and temper thee
For the evangel which thy lips must speak for me!"

"For, looking on me, how canst thou despair?
If I faint not with bitterness and pain,
When those whom I commissioned to declare
My gospel have betrayed their trust for gain,
Why dost thou falter? Let thy weary brain
Rest as a dove sits brooding in the dark,
Till thy sore heart its wonted health regain;
Then, prone to rise as the ascending spark,
Thy glad soul shall soar skyward singing like a lark!"

"I suffered thee to be cast down, because Thou so must learn how false my churches are
That pander to unrighteous worldly laws.
Thou shalt speak thus: No Christian man can hear
Arms in a war; no Christian man shall dare
To own a slave; no Christian shall conceive
Increase, or usury, or any snare
To rob his neighbor; let the Church receive Title to all things owned by them that do believe!"

"Because my gospel makes the family
The unit of society, and makes

The Church the only structure that can be Built up thereon by Christian men, he breaks
The first law of democracy who takes
A private title unto property—
Robs God and man, and in his own heart makes
The love of Mammon the idolatry
Which curses earth, from which I came to set man free."

Sadly I answered: "Lord, this sacred chrism
Is shed too late upon me. Lo, mankind,
Joined fast to false ecclesiasticism,
Harvest the husks of truth, and leave behind
The golden grain. Broken in heart and mind,
I have not faith and courage to defeat
The Law and Order systems, that, combined
With Thine own Church, have made the mercy-seat
A market-place, and gold the only Paraclete!"

"Caesars, and Scribes and Pharisees, and all
That be 'respectable and rich,' are they;
Offices, rank, and wealth, and power they call
The true religion. All their tombstones say
No rich man goes to hell, but paupers may—
For gold is god, and poverty is crime.
Thou didst mistake the Life, the Truth, the Way;
Eternal life, and all its hopes sublime,
Thy Church puts up at public auction in our time!"

Then answered Tholuj: "When thou plantest vines,
Which cometh first?—the green leaves or the fruit?
Or, when thou takest jewels from the mines,
Takest thou not up stones and clay? What brute
Hath neck and hoof so fashioned as to suit
Man's use by nature? Do not vines require
The labor of the husbandman for fruit?
The gem, the lapidary's lathe and fire?
The brute, long, careful training, bred through dam and sire?"

"For Nature is no perfect thing," I cried.
"But, hanging on Thy cross, ages ago,
Thou didst declare, as Mary's offspring died,
'Lo, it is finished!' Thy vast overthrow
Hath given immortality to woe!
I hope no longer. Generations rise
To suffer and to die. Thou didst not know
The way to save man, and the truly wise
Are they who seek the best of what this life supplies."

"Son, it is finished, and the work is good.
No later revelation will be sent.
Man needs not more to give the multitude
True life on earth, and perfect glory blent
With perfect joy beyond the firmament,
Which parts things, seen and unseen, like a veil,
Through which life passeth like to one that went Behind the shadow hanging in the dale."

"Why doth Thy kingdom, then, so miserably fail?"
"Behold," said Tholuj, "partly for this cause
I brought thee hither; this thing thou shalt learn;
Henceforth thou shalt not murmur at my laws,
Henceforth with zeal and love thy heart shalt burn;
And, learning this, thou straightway shalt return
To thine own age and people, and proclaim
My truth in righteousness, and thou shalt earn Souls for thy wages, speaking in my name
Not some new gospel, but one verily the same!"

"The kingdom of thy Lord is based upon
Communion of the saints, and faith in me.
In wisdom and in mercy it is done.
It is an Absolute Democracy,
Built on community of property
And rights among all them that do believe.
To it I gave grace and thaumaturgy,
That, seeing miracles, mankind might leave
Worship of Mammon, and to Communism cleave."

"Other foundation can no mortal lay.
The kingdoms of this world arise, grow strong,
Flourish in wickedness, and fade away
Poisoned by one irremediable wrong.
In every age and nation, tribe and tongue,
The right all human statutes recognize,
To hold and transmit property; the wrong
Whence comes the pauperism that defies
The strength of law, and mocks the wisdom of the wise."

"The Prophets and the Law this truth foretold:
The statute of the Year of Jubilee,
Which God ordained for ancient Israel,
Which mine Isaiah turned to prophecy.
Meant only this, and was fulfilled in me.
The Pharisees were covetous; they heard
When I ordained that Communism be
The basis of my kingdom, and they stirred Rome and the Pagan world to crucify the Word."

"But the Disciples—steadfast, faithful, few—
At Pentecost set up my kingdom, and,
In spite of Pagan, Pharisee, and Jew,
Proclaimed my Gospel; and that sacred band
And those who followed them, by sea and land,
Through the known world, till the fourth century,
In glad obedience to my command,
Proclaimed the kingdom of the Lord to be
But Faith and Communism of rights and property."

"This Gospel triumphed o'er the Pagan world,
Though Nero, Diocletian, and the rest
Of Rome's imperial rulers vainly hurled
The flame of persecutions, to arrest
The progress of the truth from East to West.
Where'er the standard of the cross was raised,
The Thaumaturgists gathered to attest
The spoken word by wonders that amazed
The multitude that saw, believed, obeyed, and praised."

"The Gospel was at flood-tide then. Since then
It has not reached by one poor cubit higher
On the bleak coasts of human life; for when Great Constantine, that hypocrite and liar,
Came out of Gaul, consumed with the desire
To rule Rome solely, and consolidate
The hostile factions, and bid war expire,
Only the Church had numbers, virtue, weight,
And unity enough to save the sinking State."

"The crafty heathen promised to defend
The Church from persecutions, and besought
The Christians to receive him as a friend
Who here labours—Roman standards wrought
In likeness of their crosses—when he fought

Maxentius at Red Rocks. False Constantine
Had sent shrewd messengers before, who taught
That he, like Saul, had heard a voice divine,
Beheld my cross, and came to make the empire mine!"

"The Church, sore-vexed by persecutions, thought
That truth divine, long demonstrated by
The wondrous miracles already wrought,
And further strengthened by the victory
Of Constantine's 'conversion,' could not die.
They took the bribe, made him their king, betrayed
And sold my strong, divine democracy,
And lost in that most sacrilegious trade
The thaumaturgy long triumphantly displayed;

"Because the thaumaturgy which I gave Unto the Common Church was never sent
To build up worldly kingdoms, and enslave
Man to a wonder-working government!
Mankind were slaves when my apostles went,
Saying to all: 'The truth shall make you free!'
Where'er the church takes back the pearl she spent
On pagan Rome, mine own democracy,
She shall regain the lost power of thaumaturgy—

"Never while she conforms unto the world!
Never while she to Mammon-worship cleaves!
Sooner will I, with gospel-flag unfurled,
Call Nihilists, and Socialists, and thieves,
To reconstruct society that heaves
Already, like an ocean tempest-tossed,
With a blind wrath that feels, and half perceives,
That Miracles and Communism, which cost
The blood of Christ, might save them had not these been lost."

"Son, knowest thou now what thy Lord did teach?
See'st thou that spiritual truth alone
Is but a stone within a shriveled peach—
Good for the future only, the unknown
That lives in faith and hope like all seed sown?
Or thinkest thou that He who died to save
Cared nothing for man's welfare, and made known
Naught that can profit him this side the grave,
Content to save his soul and let his body slave?"

"If now thou understandest that thy Lord
Placed politics and social truth before
All spiritual dogmas in his word—
If all the parables He uttered bore
Upon the kingdom that was nothing more
Than Communism plus Faith—go thou and preach
The Gospel that is good news to the poor,
The communistic Christism that can reach
All faithful hearts, and make them brothers, each to each!"

"For naught is needed to convert all men
Save that believers tear their own hearts free
From Mammon-worship, and then storm the den
Where Selfishness maintains its sovereignty,
The idol's stronghold, Private Property!
If the Church fail, behold, there comes an hour
When, void of faith, hope, love, thaumaturgy,
The Christless multitude shall use its power
To bid civilization perish, root and flower."

"My truth shall give the heavy-laden rest.
The labor of the Christian world shall yield
Enough to make my faithful people blest
With easy toil. New springs of joy, congealed
By unjust laws, shall rise in every field.
Of thought, desire, and hope; and man shall see
Divinest statesmanship and love revealed
In a pure system of democracy,
Whose vast resources all are held in trust for me."

"So shall all tears be wiped from every eye;
Enough for all there shall be, and to spare;
They shall not go so far away who die,
Nor shall bereaved hearts yield to despair;
For Miracles shall strengthen Faith, and prayer
Shall bring the world's Consoler very nigh;
And my true Church, set free from Mammon's snare,
Shall roll triumphant anthems to the sky,
And gladdened hosts above shall answer, 'Victory!'

"I utter no new truth, my son. Behold,
The Law and Prophets, like schoolmasters, sought
To lead Jerusalem to Christ of old!
And the Four Gospels and the Acts teach naught
Save the fulfillment of the truth they taught.
This Gospel triumphed over Paganism
Till Constantine subverted it, and brought Instead a false ecclesiasticism!
Go, thou, teach man my Truth is Faith plus Communism!"

*I knew not how it happened, but I know
That after this grand seance with the Lord
My spirit lost its bitterness and woe.
I saw new meanings in the sacred word;
I counted law and statesmanship absurd.
Although from Moses unto Blackstone I
Had mastered statutes, plainly it appeared
That Government is built upon this lie:
That Life's one sacred thing is Private Property.*

*Sinners, hear my first sermon: Jesus Christ
Is the sole statesman known to history!
All others are mere scoundrels who spiced
Some half-learned facts to lying theory!
The only perfect democrat is He,
Teaching what tendeth to the common good
Of all mankind. War, serfdom, usury,
Poison the vitals of the multitude
In every other kingdom. His alone is good!*

*Sinners, if these last fifteen centuries
Had kept His truth like the preceding three,
The wrongs, crimes, selfishness, inequities,
Which make civilization like a tree
Whose fruits are sin, and pain, and misery,
Would have been banished from the world. No schism
Had rent the Apostolic Church which He Divinely built on Faith plus Communism,
And dowered with Miracles—a threefold saving chrism!*

*Sinners, the heart of Christendom is sore!
Herod and Christ, Dives and Lazarus,
Labor and capital, the rich and poor,
Are names for one vast woe which tortures us,
French, Latin, German, Anglican, Jew,
Nought can avert the coming doom.
Though Leo and Prince Bismarck
(Like Pilate and Caiaphas) the
Of safety—naught save Christ and Faith!*

NATHAN

The Machine Muse.

SOME VALUABLE NOTES ON VERSE-MAKING MADE EASY.

THE GAME OF CRAMBO.

The game of "crambo" dates from the Dunciad. That masterly satiric home-thrust, instead of discouraging, stimulated the rhyming misability of the hour. Swift instituted the game, originating it to amuse Stella, and, once the fashion in London, Dublin, and Bath, crambo became the rage. The literary and the pseudo-literary cultivated it with cumulative assiduity. When the real craftsmen laid it down, the dilettanti took it up. When Pope tossed it aside, with a sneer, Sir Peterkin Poindexter began its painstaking cultivation.

You may not remember the first crambo verses Swift wrote. In the light of their chronological interest they are worth quoting. The question was, "Is this that?" The word, "Kiss." The verses, as follows:

If this were that or that were this,
I'd ask of Stella just one kiss.
But, dared I put the question pat,
I know she'd answer, "No, not that."
And so, denied the chieftain bliss,
I vainly feign that that were this;
And, hending low as grandest don,
I kiss the page her name is on.

What the first great leader of Irish public opinion thought not too trifling for his pen to play with, the lesser thinkers and the duller wits of the hour need not have been ashamed of. Yet more than a generation went the way of all things mundane ere the philosopher of Grub Street's literary beginning first began to play crambo. It is not greatly to Johnson's credit that he should permit himself the luxury of verses like the following. The question, "Why is Bozzy so wise?" The word, "Looking-glass." The verses, as follows:

When Jamie Boswell came from Scotia's hills
He thought he something knew of human ills,
And sought the thoroughfares of London town
That he might jot his meditations down
Of life and death, and making debts and paying.
He came a year ago, and still is staying,
For more of London town he fain would know
Ere back to Scotia's misty hills he'd go.
Small is the wonder that his heaving face,
With wit, and wisdom, and each sovereign grace,
Shines more and more unto the perfect day,
For Boswell's senses nothing have obey.
Intent on knowing all that man may know,
Pushing each throb of joy, each pang of woe,
He sits all day beside the gate of life,
Where human passions all at war are rife,
And, as the microcosmic pictures pass,
He sees them all within his looking-glass.

It is safe to assume that if Boswell had ever seen the ill-natured lampoon, the most famous of biographies would not have been the life of Johnson. Goldsmith never cared for crambo, nor did any of the notable poets of a generation later, save Southey. If Byron said, with contemptuous but characteristic unfairness, that a poet who would be guilty of crambo would prove an untrustworthy custodian of spoons, he merely expressed the prevailing sentiment of his fellow-craftsmen, including such opposite characters as Coleridge and Wordsworth and the more congenial spirit of Shelley. But De Quincey was almost as deeply addicted to crambo as he was to opium. He wrote no poetry and very little verse. It is well he did not if the following example be a fair one. The question was: "What's the boss fun?" The word: "Hot cross-bun." The verse is as follows:

Yellow-headed youngling,
Is it not boss fun,
While the cook is hanging,
To eat a hot cross-bun?

Should any one doubt that a verbal purist like De Quincey would use such a slangy word as "boss"—even in crambo—let him read the essay on "Certain Characteristics of the American Gaffly" in volume seventeen of the old American edition, which Fields edited so lovingly, and Ticknor published so exquisitely. It is not in any record to which I have had access that Landor ever played the game. So careful a critic as Siedman has classed Landor among the Victorian poets; and, indeed, it is only a step from the most Hellenic of Englishmen to our own super-polished Arnold. Surely, Matthew never descended to crambo. He might be nearer the popular heart to-day if he were capable of it. But there remains Swinburne, Morris, the late eminent founder of the school of after-Rapbaelism; the most melodious of modern verse-makers, Tennyson; the most subtle of poetic analysts, Browning.

But perhaps there be some of my readers who do not yet know what the game of crambo is. In this it consists: Be the players two or more—the golden number is variable—slips of paper are prepared by the rosy fingers of Dorothy, or the sun-browned ones of her admirer, or by those of some one else less romantic. Then each player takes two slips; writing on one a question, on the other a noun. Of the questions, one little pile is made; of the nouns, another. Then each player takes one slip from each pile, being careful not to choose his or her own. The game then begins. Each player must answer the question rhymingly, including the noun in the distich, quatrain, or elaborately builded verse structure. The method may be varied. The noun may be rhymed, ending the first line, or the last; it may begin the verses. The question may be rhymed; both may be. But the manner never varies. Each player looks at her (or his) noun, and smiles; then at her (or his) question, and smiles again. Then each player examines the end of her (or his) slip, and begins. Presently the first player to the right of the candlestick, or lamp, or drop-light, if it be a lady, says: "dear!" If it be a man; "By George!" Her (or his) right-hand neighbor immediately says: "What's the matter?" To which is replied: "This word's a queer one." "This question can't be answered!" "What nonsense!" or words of like effect. Soon it breaks into a chorus of disclaimer, swelling, lulling, dying away as the work goes on, until the player at the left of the candlestick lays down her (or his) pencil with a sigh—always with a sigh—and says: "I've finished."

San Francisco has at least one Crambo Club. I attended one of its meetings recently, and append the following four bits of verse as evidence that impromptu rhyming is not so difficult as those imagine who have never attempted it.

The word: "Sun-flower." The question: "Why are red roses red?" The verses:

"Why are red roses red?"
The æsthetic sunflower said,
"While I'm such a yellow
And ugly old fellow,
And have such a homely old head?"

Well, I really don't know;
But this answer, I trow,
Will give you some light.
If it's not wholly right:
If red roses were jealous,
And proved over-zealous,
Their neighbors to study each hour,
They'd no longer be red,
But would each have a head
As yellow as any sunflower.

The word: "Buttercup." The question: "How many miles from Widdleton to Waddleton?" The verses:

From Waddleton to Widdleton I fared one summer's day.
The yellow, yellow buttercups bloomed all along the way.
Ah! miles are short when hearts are light and tripping feet are free.
"My true love lives in Widdleton, and 'tis not far to me."

From Widdleton to Waddleton I fared that summer's night,
The yellow, yellow buttercups were hidden out of sight.
Ah! miles are long when heavy hearts make weary feet lag slow—
"The long, long miles to Waddleton are more than I may know."

Word: "Laura." Question: "What was it the rhymester said?" The verses:

This it was the poet said:
"Laura's cheeks are red—
Red as royal roses."
Yet, no harm lurks in the charm;
For this the truth discloses:
Laura's lover may discover—
Dare he touch yon roses—
That our dainty saint
Has no need to paint.

Word: "Student-lamp." Question: "Who writes the Call editorials?" The verses:

Bid me number the nebulae;
Ask me to count the sands;
Command that I speak you in one short word
The language of all the lands.

That were an easier task, by far,
Than to say what minds combine,
To aid great men unconsciously
In writing the briefest line.

Bacon and Byron and Isaac Watts,
Sinner and saint and scamp,
Even old Nick assists Mr. Pick,
As he writes by his student-lamp.

SAN FRANCISCO, December, 1882. ALFRED HARDIE.

THE AUTOGRAPH ALBUM.

Doubtless every male reader of the Argonaut has been, at some dark hour of his existence, approached by the fair possessor of an autograph album, with a smiling petition for "something original." And for days afterward the unhappy victim of such a request may be seen frequenting the alcoves of public libraries, thumbing the leaves of dusty volumes, and mumbling couplets of rhyme, until he more than suspects he has reached the border-land of idiocy. The chances are that he ultimately selects some lines at random and hastily transcribes them into the pages of the little book, which by this time looks very large for its size. The objections to such a course are obvious. Doubtless many an unsuspecting youth has been drawn hopelessly into the whirlpool of matrimony by an injudicious selection of a too ardent nature, while a quotation deficient in that very respect might seal the doom of an unhappy suitor, and cause his adored one to transfer her affections to his more successful rival. The case of that man whose verse is appropriate and felicitous is hardly more to be envied; he is thenceforward known as an album poet, and life looks dark as he contemplates the result of his insane ambition to say something good.

In view of this tricorn dilemma, it behooves us as a nation whose time is precious to devise means for our relief. There are not wanting books which profess to supply all that is desired; yet any person at all conversant with this branch of belles-lettres must admit that they are far from perfect. Life is too short and autograph albums are too numerous for us to spend much time in searching for that which should be readily accessible. What we want is a volume properly indexed, and the following suggestion is submitted as possibly an improvement upon former methods. Let there be two departments in the volume; the first devoted to the professions, the second to miscellaneous. Then by subdivisions the contents could be brought within the grasp of the feeblest intellect. Suppose, for instance, a cautious lawyer is asked to contribute a few lines to the album of a lady friend; he refers to division "Professions," and, following his finger, we read:

PROFESSIONS—
Lawyer, Friendship—
intense.....	68
dignified, but declarative.....	74
ambiguous or non-committal.....	76

Turning to the latter page, as being the most promising, he might find something not unlike this:

The lines you ask for tax my brain
Unduly;
I wish your friendship to retain,
And, without prejudice, remain
Yours truly.

A physician, worried and perplexed by some difficult case, might select the following lines from the same page as best expressing his views:

Whatever 'tis I ought to say
Imagine I have said it,
And finish in the proper way,
By thinking you have read it.

It will be observed from the above specimens, that one verse might be adapted to many cases, but, of course, it would not always be so. A clergyman, somewhat bopeless but very much in earnest, might pursue this line of thought to advantage:

PROFESSIONS—
Minister,
Love—
tender and emotional.....	119
dignified, but declarative.....	140
ambiguous or non-committal.....	157

Finding under the second-named direction this sentiment:

The page is fair, why should I mar its whiteness
With studied lines and phrases of politeness?
If in my daily walk and conversation
I have not shown my ardent adoration,
I can not hope, by polished composition,
To make apparent my forlorn condition.

An impetuous sophomore, his heart thumping against the album of his Dulcinea, flies to his room, opens the "The-saurus of Sentiment," and runs his course:

MISCELLANEOUS—Undergraduate,
Love—
tender and emotional.....	127

Be still, thou madly throbbing brain,
And aid thou mine endeavor
To sing, in fitting words, a strain
Whose notes shall ring forever!

Alas, my tongue's a worthless thing!
The silence is unbroken.
I worship thee, but can not sing,
My Polly of Hohoken!

Especial attention is invited to the subterfuge suggested in this closing line. It may, of course, be varied to suit other localities, and is very effective, as it gives a semblance of originality to the production. Another feature worthy of note is the writer's inability to do the subject justice. This artifice, however, is somewhat antique, not to say antediluvian, and should be used with much caution. The number of examples might easily be multiplied, but it is believed that a sufficient assortment has been presented to convince the most skeptical of the value of this suggestion. The chaplet of undying fame awaits the man who shall accomplish the production of such a volume, and the persecuted of autograph album-owners shall rise up and call him blessed. December 15, 1882. WM. A. CALDWELL.

A gentleman, who died in Paris, left a legacy of six thousand dollars to his niece, in Dubuque, Iowa, who, it appears, also died about the same hour of the same day. The question, "which died first?" turns upon the relation of solar to true time, and must be decided by the difference of longitude. If the niece had died at four o'clock A. M., and her uncle at ten o'clock A. M., the instants of their death would have been identical. Assuming that to be the hour of the testator's death, if the niece died at any hour between four and ten, although the legacy would apparently revert to his estate, it would really vest in her and her heirs, since by solar time she would have actually survived her uncle. Another case where great importance depended upon the precise time of death was that of Earl Fitzhardinge, who died "about midnight" between October 10 and 11. His rents, amounting to forty thousand pounds sterling a year, were payable on Old Lady day and Old Michaelmas day. The latter fell that year (1857) on Sunday, October 11, and the day began at midnight; so that if he died before twelve, the rents belonged to the parties taking the estate; but if after, they belonged to and formed part of his personal estate. The difference of one minute might, therefore, involve the title of twenty thousand pounds sterling.

Questions for discussion: Whether—as in the case of the Abbé Prevost, in the forest of Chantilly—if a supposed cadaver, while subjected to the investigating knife of the anatomist, should awake from a trance only to be conscious of his horrible condition, and to expire from the immediate effect of the dissection, it is anything more than homicide per infortuniam, or not. Whether, in the case of Lazarus, who was restored to life by the Saviour after decomposition had commenced, he could have reclaimed property already in the possession and occupancy of the heirs to whom he had willed it before death.

DOANE & HENSHELWOOD

We are now offering for the HOLIDAY SEASON a large and choice stock of Hand-run Spanish Lace Scarfs and Fichus, from the cheapest grades to the finest qualities. Also, every description of Ladies Neck-wear. Our stock of Handkerchiefs is much larger than former seasons, and comprises all kinds of Plain and Fancy Handkerchiefs for Ladies, Gentlemen, and Children. Gents' Hem-stitched Silk Handkerchiefs, in white and colors, at all prices.

Elegant Brocade Velvets and Silks, and Bonnet Silks, in every quality.

Russia Leather Goods, direct from Vienna.
Foster Kid Gloves, in every size, shade, and length, just received. Every pair warranted.

132 KEARNY STREET,
THURLOW BLOCK.

CHRISTMAS BOOKS

CHRISTMAS AT CHRISTMAS
STATIONERY. CARDS.

BANGCROFT'S.

THOMAS DAY & CO.

122 AND 124 SUTTER STREET,

Have now in a complete assortment of BRASS,
BRONZE, BISQUE, FAIENCE, and other RARE
ORNAMENTS for the HOLIDAYS.

The Choicest Designs in GAS FIXTURES and RARE LAMPS are arriving daily.

PIANOS

HENRY F. MILLER, OF BOSTON,
HEMME & LONG, OF SAN FRANCISCO,
GROVESTEEEN & FULLER, OF NEW YORK,
TAYLOR & FARLEY ORGANS.

WOODWORTH, SCHELL & CO.,
Sole Agents, 105 Stockton Street, San Francisco.

PIANOS TO RENT.

THE GREATEST INVENTION of the AGE,
THE FAIRY SEWING MACHINE.

HANDSOME, STRONG, PRACTICAL, CHEAP, DURABLE. Endorsed by the Public Press and all the leading Physicians of the United States. A first-class, handsome, practical Sewing Machine, upon which any lady can do the work of an entire family without injury to the health.

This Sewing Machine is constructed upon a new, novel, and scientific principle, requiring only about one-fifth the strength necessary to run an ordinary Sewing Machine. It is impossible for it to get out of order, as it has no complicated machinery, and it will never refuse to stitch; being simple in construction and operation, any six year old child can operate it.

THE FAIRY is recommended by Physicians as the only Machine that can be run by Ladies without injury to the health. It will do just as good work as a $50.00 Machine, and sew any kind of cloth from fine cambric to the heaviest made, either single or double thickness, and for fine embroidery no heavy cloth can not be excelled. It makes the celebrated loop-stitch so popular among the ladies for home sewing and embroidery, and takes the Number 2 Singer needle. Every one is tried and warranted before leaving the factory. Each and every Machine sent out is threaded, ready to run, and a spool of colored silk and sample of stitching sent with each, with full instructions how to operate.

The running parts of the Fairy Machine are all nickel plated. Having secured exclusive control of this Machine by taking the entire production of the factory, we will, upon receipt of only FOUR DOLLARS, send one of these Machines pre-paid to any part of the United States upon the following terms:

TERMS AND CONDITIONS.—Each order for a Machine must be accompanied by the attached Certificate, with the statement that you saw the advertisement in this publication, and that you will accept the Agency for your town if the Machine is satisfactory. Under no other conditions will we ship one of these Machines, and under no circumstances will we ship more than one Machine to a town at this price. All other parties will have to pay $10, or will be referred to our Agent in their vicinity. Persons ordering from Canada or foreign countries, must pay transportation charges.

Be sure always to mention your Expresses as well as Post Office Address.

THIS CERTIFICATE IS VALUABLE

THIS CERTIFICATE, accompanied by FOUR DOLLARS entitles the holder to ONE FAIRY SEWING MACHINE, delivered, charges pre-paid to any part of the United States, until GOOD ONLY TILL FEB. 1st, 1883, and must be accompanied by the Name, Post Office, and Express Address of the Sender.

CUT THIS CERTIFICATE OUT

Only a limited number of these Machines will be sold at this price, and no order will be filled for less than $10 after Feb. 1st, 1883. Our only object in placing this advertisement before the public is to obtain an Agent in every town to sell these Machines. Any Machine not satisfactory or different from what we represent it can be returned to us; all we ask is for you to give it a fair trial. We want active, energetic men to sell the FAIRY, and to each we will guarantee $150 per month and expenses. As to our responsibility we refer to the publishers of this paper. Address all orders to E. C. RIDEOUT & CO., 10 Barclay St., New York.

SIBERIAN BALSAM

CURES

CATARRH AND ASTHMA,

..... ALSO,.....

CROUP, COUGHS, AND COLDS, AND ALL AFFECTIONS
OF THE BRONCHIAL TUBES AND THE PULMONARY ORGANS,

As well as the

DISEASES OF THE KIDNEYS AND URINARY ORGANS.

The SIBERIAN BALSAM is a purely vegetable compound, and pronounced by all who have tried it to be the most effective remedy for the diseases above enumerated ever used by them. It has never failed when taken according to directions to give immediate relief and effect a permanent cure. It reaches the disease through the blood and removes the cause. Coughs and Colds, Sore Throats, and Hoarseness relieved at once and cured in from one to two days.

CLERGYMEN, PUBLIC SPEAKERS, ACTORS, AND VOCALISTS,

Affected with HOARSENESS, or LOSS OF VOICE, will find almost instantaneous relief from a single dose of SIBERIAN BALSAM.

FOR SALE BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

DEPOT, 415 MONTGOMERY STREET, SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

MUSICAL BOXES.

M. J. PAILLARD & CO., 23 Dupont Street, San Francisco, Manufacturers and Importers. A. E. GUILLERAT, Exclusive Agent. Musical Boxes repaired.

HOLIDAY GOODS.

Elegant Imported Leather and Fancy Goods, Beautiful Juvenile and Finely Bound Standard and Artistic Gift Books. Christmas Cards, from English, European and American makers.

C. BEACH,

107 MONTGOMERY ST., OPPOSITE THE OCCIDENTAL.

OPEN EVENINGS.

ESTABLISHED 1858.

W. K. VANDERSLICE & CO.

MANUFACTURING

JEWELERS AND SILVERSMITHS.

AMERICAN WATCHES, CHATELAINES in Gold and Silver. DIAMONDS in single stones and matched pairs, and an elegant line of JEWELRY, including all the latest novelties for HOLIDAY GIFTS, at the very closest prices.

136 SUTTER STREET. OPEN EVENINGS.

FOIL STONE DIAMONDS IN SOLID GOLD MOUNTINGS have never been sold in this country. They are entirely new goods, the most perfect imitation of the diamond ever produced, and the only one that retains the brilliancy and fire of the genuine diamond. Time has no effect upon the lustre of these goods, and we will guarantee that no one but experts can tell them from genuine diamonds. In order to introduce our Jewellery Catalogue to the notice of new customers for the fall and winter trade, we will offer these goods for the next 60 days at only $4.00 each. Take your choice of either Ring, Stud, Ear-drops or Bosom Pin for $1.00. Above illustrations were made from the goods and are exact representations. We will refund the money in every instance if you are not more than satisfied. A regular retail price of these goods is from $2 to $5 each, and you can sell hundreds at that price. Send money by registered letter or Post Office order, at our risk. As to our responsibility we refer to the publishers of this paper. Address E. C. RIDEOUT & CO., 10 Barclay St., N. Y.

DIVIDEND NOTICE—OFFICE OF

The Standard Consolidated Mining Company, San Francisco, Dec. 2, 1882.—At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the above named Company, held this day, dividend No. 48, of Twenty-five cents per share was declared, payable on Tuesday, December 12, 1882, at the office in this city, or at the Farmers' Loan and Trust Company in New York. WM. WILLIAMS, Secretary.

EXTRA DIVIDEND NOTICE—Office

of the Standard Consolidated Mining Company, San Francisco, December 2, 1882.—At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the above named Company, held this day, an extra dividend (No. 49), of twenty-five cents per share, was declared, payable on Tuesday, December 12, 1882, at the office in this city, or at the Farmers' Loan and Trust Company in New York. WM. WILLIAMS, Secretary.

The Inner Man.

Napoleon's Cook at St. Helena.

Among the many curious and interesting traditions and records relating to the latter days of the great emperor on his island-prison, says a writer in the New Orleans Times-Democrat, none are more so than those included and published in the "Reminiscences of Napoleon's Cook at St. Helena." It was written chiefly by a M. Careme, but the facts, incidents, and anecdotes are certainly from the actual and personal reminiscences of "Chandelier," who was first a soldier of the republic, then one in the army of Italy, and finally a cook. He was the fourth and last chef de cuisine that Napoleon had at St. Helena; the three previous were obliged to retire from ill health, and Napoleon had written to his mother, "Madame Mère," to provide a fourth. His sister Pauline, the Princesse Borghese, thought of M. Chandelier, who gladly accepted the office, chiefly, it is said, from devotion and affection for "le petit Caporal." Immediately thereafter he joined a physician and two priests, who were then about to depart for St. Helena. When Chandelier reached England, the returned "artist" and chef whom he was going out to succeed called on him, and advised him to carry out a complete set of cooking utensils, materials for constructing a German stove, and a "machine" for making "artificial ice," and, above all, plenty of sal ammoniac for that purpose, no ice being procurable in St. Helena. They arrived at St. Helena, where General Bertrand received the new cook. As soon as M. Chandelier had looked about him he commenced operations, and soon began to set up the German stove he brought with him from London. It was a difficult task; for he was forced with his own hands to make the bricks and do the masonry, even to forge some of the iron work. There had been a brick oven formerly at Longwood, but it was useless, because there was no wood on the island fit to heat it, and in consequence no baking. Napoleon paid several visits to him while this German stove was setting up, and said to Chandelier: "It is well that you have seen Laroche in London, (Laroche had been Napoleon's chef;) you will have much less trouble, and will preserve your health and sight, and will be able to serve me up 'little patties for breakfast,' and the patties were subsequently daily served up at half an hour's notice in satisfactory style. The emperor one day ordered a camp soup for his breakfast. Chandelier, who had been a soldier, did not like serving up the coarse hodge-podge of the common soldier. He put in less bread and left out the haricots, (a kind of white bean,) and the result was that the emperor was dissatisfied. "Thou," said he, "has been a soldier, and knowest that this is not a camp soup. Eh bien! make me a better to-morrow." So, on the morrow, Chandelier served up a real camp soup, stuffed with bread and full of haricots. The spoon stood upright in it, and the emperor saw that it was what he wanted. He ate some of it, but never again asked for it. Did he think of his diet when a pupil of the school at Brienne, of his lieutenant days in the artillery, or did that camp soup bring back to memory the glorious campaigns of Bonaparte commanding the army of Italy? Chandelier speaks in no flattering terms of the climate of St. Helena and the situation of Longwood. The emperor's house was five miles from town, and situated on the table of an arid and rocky mountain, where the atmosphere was unwholesome even to the natives. The temperature would often change three or four times a day. When the sunshine came the heat was insufferable, for there was no shade. Of vegetation there was little, the rats and dry winds checking its growth. The supply of fresh provisions was derived from Brazil and the Cape of Good Hope, and as the sheep and cattle had to endure a long voyage, they arrived at St. Helena lean and out of order, and never fattened after landing, as the island furnished no means of restoring them to condition. The flesh was invariably tasteless, sometimes even quite unwholesome. All Chandelier's attempts to fatten fowls, pullets, geese, ducks, and turkeys inevitably failed. Nothing could overcome their leanness. St. Helena produced no game. A few red partridges and pheasants arrived twice or thrice a year. Chinese pigs alone arrived fat and lovely, and M. Chandelier reports favorably of them. He says that their flesh was delicious, and that it gave him infinite pleasure to prepare pork griskins, sausages, and black puddings, of all of which Napoleon was very fond. Fish was scarce, none of the European kinds visiting the island. Oysters, crabs, lobsters, or any kind of shell fish, were not to be had. Only two kinds of fish were at all tolerable; one is what the French called the "bonne femme," and the other, which is long, like an eel, but not thicker than the little finger, is called the needle-fish. The only fruit of any value was the banana; this he utilized in fritters, or iced with rum. The climate was so variable that neither citron nor oranges could ripen; grapes and apricots never came to maturity; apples, pears, and peaches were bad. Napoleon's breakfast consisted of sorrel pottage, or any other refreshing pottage, breast of mutton boned and well grilled, served with a clear gravy, a roast chicken or two griskins, and sometimes a plate of pulse. For dinner, he had a pottage, a remove, two entrées, a roast, and two side-dishes of sweetmeats or pastry, of which he was very fond. This was always served on plate. The removes used to puzzle Monsieur Chandelier, for he often had nothing for the purpose but large pieces of beef, mutton, or fresh pork, with sometimes (by a happy chance) a goose, a turkey, or a sucking pig. Madeira, Tenerife, and Constantia were the wines supplied to the suite of the emperor. His own drink was claret, and of that very moderately. Napoleon's cook is particular to record in these "Reminiscences" what dishes his master preferred: Roasted fowl, pullets minced "à la Marengo," "à l'Italienne," "à la Provençal" without garlic; minced fowls sometimes done in champagne, which was dear in the island, as much as twenty shillings a bottle. Red puddings "à la Richelieu;" but above all he prepared sweet things and pastry, such as "vols-au-vent, petites tarts à la reine," and little cakes of macaroni prepared in various ways. The cook was unable (he relates with much sorrow) to make these as good as he ought, because the macaroni, though sent from Naples, grew stale on the passage, as did the parmesan. As Napoleon's health grew worse he was more difficult to please, and poor Monsieur Chandelier found his skill and ingenuity taxed to do this. When the emperor died his executor paid to each of his servants the sum left them to take them from St. Helena, and handed them orders for the legacies bequeathed them by their imperial master. The sum of ten thousand francs was thus paid to the cook in St. Helena, and, after he reached Paris, the further sum of eighty-five thousand francs was given to him. Thus, besides his salary, he had about four thousand pounds sterling. This was good payment for one year's service.

Roman Punch—History and Mode of Preparation.

This delicious but insidious punch or semi-ice, remarks the Caterer, is a most delightful and refreshing luxury for the summer solstice. But to fully appreciate and enjoy its rare excellence, it should be eaten at a fine dinner, as a coup de milieu, during the intervening time between the roast and game courses. Taken at that time, it cools and refreshes the palate, and whets the appetite anew, so as to enable the diner to go at it again with all the zest of a fresh start. A French lady, once enjoying this fine ice, is said to have exclaimed: "What a pity that this pleasure is not a sin!" Taste and morality so Parisian need no comment. The history of Punch à la Romaine is somewhat curious, and deserves mention. It had been, for nearly a century, the summer refreshment of successive Popes, and their cooks were threatened with the horrors of the Holy Office if they ventured to impart the secret of its preparation. The invasion of Italy by the great Napoleon, in 1796, served to break through this terrible interdiction; a young man named Molas, son of the confectioner of Pius VI., no sooner saw the French eagles soaring over the Eternal City than he ran away from his father, leaving the patty-pans and jelly-bags of the Vatican to their fate, and united his fortunes with those of the conqueror. Young master Molas became a favorite servant of the ill-starred Josephine; when she died he obtained a situation in the culinary establishment of the Russian Prince, Lieven, and accompanied his excellency to London, on his appointment as ambassador to the Court of St. James. The prince was the first to introduce the papal delicacy in London, and the guests who partook of it at the prince's table were thrown into ecstasies. The recipe was sent to Carlton House, in compliance with the wish of the Prince Regent, and his royal highness permitted copies to be given to a select few of his friends; by degrees it became better known, and is now made in a more or less degree of excellence the world over.

The veritable Vatican recipe and manner of serving it are as follows:

Prepare a very rich pieoppleade or sherbert; have it a little tart with lemon juice, taking the greatest care that none of the zest or oil from the white underlying pith be allowed to enter into the composition of this sherbet; in order to be certain of this, it is best, first, to grate off the yellow rinds from the lemons, then to carefully remove all the white pith, and, to make assurance doubly sure, wash the skinned fruit in clear water, after which press out the juice free from all flavor of the rind of the fruit; strain the juice so as to remove all the seeds or pips from it; then add it to the pineapple mixture. It must then be well frozen; this sherbet, being very rich, will not freeze hard, but will be a semi-ice. Just before the punch is to be served, add raw work into it, for every quart of the ice, one gill of old Jamaica, and for every two quarts one pint of the best champagne. Never use the wine from damaged bottles or leaky corks, as it will be sure to deprave, and perhaps entirely spoil, your punch. After you have well incorporated these liquors, add the following cream or meringue mixture: Beat the whites of eight fresh eggs (or two whites for every quart of punch) to a very stiff froth or snow; boil one pound of sugar to the consistency of a stout syrup, and beat it until cold, then add it gradually in a small stream to the beaten white of eggs, stirring the mass all the time with a wooden spatula until the whole is thoroughly mixed. Add this boiled meringue mixture to the frozen punch, working it with the long handled spatula until all is thoroughly incorporated. Serve in tall glasses, and if properly made your mixture should be smooth, white, and as thick as good double cream.

Some of the grand old epicures and bon vivants of our day have varied, and, in fact, almost reversed, the above old and reverend formula, by making the sherbet for this punch in the following manner:

Select, say, three dozen lemons, the coats of which are smooth, and whose rinds are not too thin; peel these with a sharp knife into a large earthen or china vessel, taking care that none but the thin yellow rind be detached, which is that portion in which the cells are placed containing the essential oil of the fruit. When this part of the process is completed, add two pounds of broken lump-sugar, and stir the peel and sugar together with a wooden spatula for half an hour, thereby extracting the greater portion of the essential oil. Next pour boiling water into the vessel, and stir steadily until the sugar is completely dissolved. Then cut and squeeze the lemons, strain the juice, put the seeds or pips into a separate vessel, pour boiling water upon them; these pips are enveloped in a thin mucilage, full of flavor; now throw into the sherbet one-half the lemon juice, and as soon as the pips are free from their transparent coating, strain off the liquor and add it to mixture. Now taste it, and add more sugar or more acid, as may be required, only taking care to have it rich of the fruit with plenty of sweetness. For every half-dozen lemons used, beat up the whites of three eggs to a stiff snow, and pour upon them half a pound of simple syrup that has been boiled to the thickness of molasses and cooled; mix well together, and add and work it into the frozen sherbet. When you are about to use it, add spirits in the following proportion: for every six lemons used add half a pint of old Jamaica rum, half a pint of Cognac, a wineglassful of genuine Maraschino, and a pint of the finest champagne. Work these well in and freeze again for a short time; serve in small crystal goblets, and with a thankful heart proceed to discuss.

This fine iced punch must not be confounded with, nor judged of, by the miserable stuff compounded and sold in a majority of the shops of our great cities, which is only a poor diluted specimen of orange, lemon, or pineapple ice, with a little common colored whisky (called brandy) poured over it, then dubbed with the grand old name of Punch à la Romaine, and sold to the unsophisticated as the genuine article.

Burgundy, Demostheos—Champagne, Cicero.

The great planting of vines in the champagne district, Mr. Vizetelly informs us, says the Saturday Review, plainly dates from the last quarter of the fourteenth century, at which epoch large exports of wine to the provinces of Hainault and Flanders, and especially to the port of Sluys, are noted; and from this date down to the present day, he traces the history of the vineyards and the wine with wonderful care and fullness. There has, we believe, hitherto been a doubt as to the exact period of the invention of what we now understand by champagne. A tendency to effervescence in the wines, probably of Champagne, seems to be referred to in a letter of Baccius, physician to Pope Sixtus V., and there are various other indications, notwithstanding which, however, "a conscientious writer candidly acknowledges that, despite minute and painstaking researches, he can not tell when what is now known as sparkling champagne first made its appearance." From Mr. Vizetelly we learn that in 1670 the Benedictine vineyards were presided over by one Dom Perignon, one of whose distinctions was that, "having noted that one kind of soil imparted fragrance and another generosity, while the produce of others were deficient in both these attributes," he hit upon the happy idea of marrying or blending the produce of the different vineyards together. Further, he succeeded, for the first time, in obtaining a perfectly white wine from black champagne grapes; and yet further, "by some happy accident, or by a series of experimental researches—for the exact facts of the discovery are lost forever"—he found a way of regulating the tendency of the wine to effervesce, and succeeded in producing a perfectly sparkling wine that burst forth from the bottle and overflowed the glass. "A correlative result of his investigations was the present system of corking bottles, a wisp of tow dipped in oil being the sole stopper in use prior to his time. To him, too, we owe, not only sparkling champagne itself, but the proper kind of glass to drink it out of;" which, according to Mr. Vizetelly, is the tall, thin, tapering glass, such as one sees but seldom nowadays. In the chapter which follows the account of Dom Perignon, and which is called "The Battle of the Wines," there is a great deal of amusing and curious matter, from which we may select the ingenious parallel made by Canon Maucroix of Reims, who died in 1708: "In the wine of Burgundy there is more strength and vigor; it does not play with its man so much, it overthrows him more suddenly—that is Demosthenes. The wine of Champagne is subtler and more delicate; it amuses him, and for a longer time, but in the end it does not produce less effect—that is Cicero."

Good Dinners.

"My friend Lucullus," says Henry Watterson, "who has the choicest wine-cellar in the country, and gives the best dinners on our side of the Atlantic—where I am disposed to think the best dinners are given—once asked me to take pot-luck with him. It was a ruse. The dinner was something superb; the company something distinguished; the purpose, on a wager, to show me my provincialism. There were Moorish wines in leathern pouches, long, crooked necks, and no end of oil and wax; port fifty years out of the docks of London; Madeira old enough to have grandchildren. When the ladies went, and the "discussion" was called, and my host came over and took the vacant chair of the hostess, I modestly asked for a glass of champagne, which was instantly supplied, which occasioned great merriment around the table, and I was told that the "argument" in hand—i. e., 'What Constitutes Provincialism?'—was over; since my going by the rare wines of Lucullus and preferring champagne proved me to be a rustic. 'Not so, not so,' quoth I, when I was able to get a hearing; 'it proves just the contrary—it proves me a cosmopolitan. If I were a provincial I should only be too glad to keep my mouth open to these rare wines of Lucullus. I should twist my feet beneath this mahogany in awe-struck silence. I do not do this because I am used to them. I ask him for what I want—for what I know to be as abundant and as accessible in this house as water. That is a liberty which pays a compliment to his hospitality. Now, if I had asked him for a glass of buttermilk—which might, and doubtless would, have embarrassed him—I should be a provincial. You, dear friends, are provincial in taking note of anything that happens at a gentleman's table.' This merely as an interlude, an illustration, to show that those who consider themselves men of the world do not know what is a good dinner, nor how to serve or enjoy one. Thackeray—who, upon vicinals, is a very prose Horace—has an essay entitled, 'Memorials of Gormandizing.' It is a noble pæan to food; not so tender as 'The Ballad of Bouillabaisse,' but very witty and effusive. In this delightful prose poem the most human of English satirists tells how, one murky afternoon in Paris, he met an old friend, between whom and himself a coolness had existed; they met face to face; they were alone and lonely; they had been wandering for hours in quest of somebody; they entered an adjacent restaurant, and had a beefsteak and a bottle of red wine; they beamed, they glowed, they sopped their bread in the residuum of gravy left in the bottom of the dish, and they loved one another. That—that was a good dinner! The best dinner I can recall was in the woods of Georgia, with James Eustis, a staff officer of General Joe Johnston, who afterward became United States senator, and Harry Yeatman, General Polk's aid-de-camp. A good dinner is perfect food perfectly dressed; not a great array of dishes. The art of cooking is the first of the fine arts. The first woman in America is not she who bears most children—a brutal Napoleonism—but she who prepares the best dish; because by this one act, this superior accomplishment, she contributes to the health of her children and the fidelity of her husband. In my poor way, I have tried to disseminate in Kentucky the idea of good, and clean, and wholesome food."

OREGON IMPROVEMENT CO.

CUMBERLAND COAL,
LEHIGH LUMP and EGG COAL,
AT WHOLESALE.

SEATTLE COAL,

At Reduced Rates for Domestic and Steam Use.

MAIN OFFICE:

210 BATTERY STREET,
San Francisco.

DEPOTS:

Beale Street Wharf, San Francisco.
Foster's Wharf - Oakland.

PLAIN TRUTHS

The blood is the foundation of life, it circulates through every part of the body, and unless it is pure and rich, good health is impossible. If disease has entered the system the only sure and quick way to drive it out is to purify and enrich the blood.

These simple facts are well known, and the highest medical authorities agree that nothing but iron will restore the blood to its natural condition; and also that all the iron preparations hitherto made blacken the teeth, cause headache, and are otherwise injurious.

BROWN'S IRON BITTERS will thoroughly and quickly assimilate with the blood, purifying and strengthening it, and thus drive disease from any part of the system, and it will not blacken the teeth, cause headache or constipation, and is positively not injurious.

Saved his Child.

17 N. Eutaw St., Baltimore, Md.

Feb. 12, 1880.
Gents:—Upon the recommendation of a friend I tried Brown's IRON BITTERS as a tonic and restorative for my daughter, whom I was thoroughly convinced was wasting away with Consumption. Having lost three daughters by the terrible disease, under the care of eminent physicians, I was loth to believe that anything could arrest the progress of the disease, but, to my great surprise, before my daughter had taken one bottle of Brown's IRON BITTERS, she began to mend and now is quite restored to former health. A fifth daughter began to show signs of Consumption, and when the physician was consulted he quickly said "Tonics were required;" and when informed that the elder sister was taking Brown's IRON BITTERS, responded "that is a good tonic, take it."
ADAM PHILIPS.

BROWN'S IRON BITTERS effectually cures Dyspepsia, Indigestion and Weakness, and renders the greatest relief and benefit to persons suffering from such wasting diseases as Consumption, Kidney Complaints, etc.

S. P. COLLINS & CO.

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL
dealers in Old London Dock Brandy, Port Wine, Sherries, and all the choicest brands Champagne, Apple Jack, Pisco, Arrack, Cordials, Liqueurs, etc. 220 MONTGOMERY, and 511 CALIFORNIA STREETS, S. F.

CALIFORNIA SUGAR REFINERY.

OFFICE, - - - 325 Market St.
WORKS, Eighth and Brannan Sts.
C. SPRECKELS, President,
J. D. SPRECKELS, Vice-President,
A. B. SPRECKELS, Secretary.

CONSUMPTION.

I have a positive remedy for the above disease; by its use thousands of cases of the worst kind and of long standing have been cured. Indeed, so strong is my faith in its efficacy, that I will send TWO BOTTLES FREE, together with a VALUABLE TREATISE on this disease, to any sufferer. Give Express & P. O. address, DR. T. A. SLOCUM, 181 Pearl St., N. Y.

JNO. LEVY & CO.

118 SUTTER STREET,

Makers and Importers of Fine

JEWELRY,

Have made extensive preparations for the HOLIDAY TRADE, and have added a most exquisite and odd line of NOVELTIES to their already ELEGANT STOCK of DIAMONDS, PRECIOUS STONES, WATCHES, SILVERWARE, CARRIAGE and WAXTEL CLOCKS, OPERA GLASSES, FANS, etc., together making the handsomest display of goods ever exhibited in this city. We cordially invite an inspection of our stock, it being no trouble to show goods. Everything marked in plain figures and strictly one price.

WE SELL AT CLOSER PRICES THAN ANY HOUSE IN OUR LINE.

OPEN EVENINGS.

COLMAN BROS.

Stylish and Serviceable CLOTHING at Lowest Prices. In every department our goods are marked for sale at the merest advance over manufacturing cost. The pinnacle of success attained in our Men's, Boys', and Children's Departments. Our original styles at popular low prices, compelling buyers to patronize us. Satisfaction guaranteed. Established 1853.

LEADING CLOTHIERS,

SOUTHWEST CORNER MONTGOMERY AND BUSH STREETS.

N. B.—A large variety of Dressing Gowns and Smoking Jackets just received direct from Europe.

FINE BOOKS.

Just received from Europe a choice collection of STANDARD and ILLUSTRATED BOOKS, in fine bindings, for the HOLIDAYS, which I offer at very low prices. A call is respectfully solicited.

MAX H. FAY, AGENT, IMPORTER OF FINE BOOKS,

Rooms 14, 15, 16, Thurlow Block, 126 Kearny St.

TAKE THE ELEVATOR.

OPEN EVENINGS.

KNABE PIANOS

"I have never seen their equal."—Clara Louise Kellogg.

A. L. Bancroft & Co., 121 Market St., S. F., Sole Agents.

A VALUABLE GIFT! The Little Wonder Time Keeper and a Handsome Steel Vest Chain Sent Absolutely FREE!

and four Time-keepers and Chains. Satisfaction guaranteed or money refunded. Address, S. H. MOORE, Publisher, No. 3 Park Place, New York.

HOLIDAY-STYLE HATS

IN A LARGE VARIETY, AND A SPECIAL LINE OF

FINE CHILDREN'S GOODS,

JUST OPENED BY

C. HERRMANN & CO.

(HERRMANN, THE HATTER.)

336 KEARNY STREET, BETWEEN BUSH AND PINE STS.

"Dress Reform" CORSET.

Specially for Stout Figures, (worn with or without Straps,) by mail, $3.00. Send waist, hip, and bust measure. Also, Shoulder Braces, Union Under Flannels, Ladies' and Children's Comfort Waists, Bustles, Hose Supporters, etc. Send for Circular. The only Depot for these goods.

MRS. M. H. OBER & CO.
Boston Dress Reform,
336 Sutter Street,
SAN FRANCISCO.

An Elegant Corset to Order for $4.

J. R. COWEN.

J. W. PORTER.

COWEN & PORTER,

FUNERAL DIRECTORS,

118 Geary Street,

San Francisco.

OPPOSITE STARE-KING CHURCH.

C. P. SHEFFIELD. N. W. SPAULDING. J. PATTERSON

17 and 19 FREMONT ST., SAN FRANCISCO.

THE AMERICAN SUGAR REFINERY

SAN FRANCISCO,

MANUFACTURERS OF ALL

Classes of Refined Sugars, including Loaf Sugar for export.

C. ADOLPHE LOW, President.

Office—208 California Street.

C. ADOLPHE LOW & CO.

Commission Merchants,

SAN FRANCISCO.

OFFICE IN NEW YORK, 42 CEDAR

Street

Liberal advances made on consignments

SAMUEL P. MIDDLETON,

AUCTIONEER.

JOHN MIDDLETON & SON,

Stock, Real Estate, and General

AUCTIONEERS.

116 Montgomery Street,

Occidental Hotel Block

SAN FRANCISCO.

ALASKACOMMERCIAL CO.

No. 310 SANSOME STREET,

WHOLESALE DEALER IN FURS.

MAGNESO-CALCITE

BOND AND NOTE CASES,

JEWEL CASES,

HOUSEHOLD CHESTS,

ABSOLUTELY FIRE-PROOF.

D. S. BROWN & CO.,

36 California Street.

CHRISTMAS CARDS AND FINE STATIONERY

AT DODGE, BROS. & SHREVE, 32 GEARY ST.

AFTER THE DANCE.

The Waltzing Man.

Hand me my light gloves, James;
I'm off for the waltzing world,
The Kingdom of Strauss and that—
Where is my old crush hat?
Is my hair properly curled?
Call in the daytime, James.

Think of me, won't you, James,
When I am rosy twirling
The "Rose of a garden of girls,"
The Pearl among circling pearls,
In a mesh of melodious whirling?
Envy me, won't you, James?

For a heart lost along with her fan,
For a nice sense of honor flung,
For the care of an invalid soul,
And tastes far beyond my control,
I have for my precious own
The fame of a "waltzing man."

If I don't come, come for me, James—
Ah, the waltz is my mastering passion!
The trip-tripping airs are as sweet
As love to my turning feet,
While I clasp the fair doll of fashion,
My fiancée. But come for me, James.

The heart which I lost—it is strange—
I've been told it will yet be my death;
And I think it quite likely I might Waltz once too often to-night.
In spite of the music and Beth,
Death's a difficult move to arrange.

Pray, smoke by the fire, old boy,
And find yourself whisky and books.
If I should not turn up, then, at two
Or three, you will know I need you.
If I'm dead, you must pardon my looks
As I lie in the ball-room, old boy.

The Last Waltz.

We stood in the innermost circle;
We flew with a mystical current—
The drift of the dance—to a surging
Refrain that rolled under and under,
Yet never was lost in the sinking
Of melody's flood-tide and ebb-tide.
As breezes, where starlight shines dimly,
Fly rustling, so fled we together;
And deep through the eddies of music
And dreams my senses were carried,
While calm o'er the harmony's tumult
My heart like a flower leaned in shadow.
I loved, but my love was unuttered,
And hopelessly doomed to be silent—
A bird in the nest ever fettered,
To live without singing or flying.
In the hushes the singing of thrushes,
The waving of palm and of myrtle;
Then again rose the wind-notes so urgent,
And quick-flowing sounds bore us whirling.
At last, as if life-breath were ceasing—
The world of the dance far behind us—
We paused, with "Good-night," and retreating,
I knew we were henceforth divided.
Yet still the remembrance, half mournful,
Comes haunting me now, in a twilight
Of years that my love has made lonely;
And music still rings through the silence.

—George P. Lathrop.

Una Señora.

One found a reason when she came
Why the Paseo glowed with light,
And why the music swelled and thrilled
As if upon a festive night.

The band was playing "Le Désir"—
Why that old strain, I can not tell—
And all her carriage, all her grace,
Accorded with the music well.

High overhead the southern moon
Shone as no other moon can shine;
Perhaps I fixed her liquid glance,
Perhaps 'twas but a fancy mine;

And yet in northern climes and far,
The scene before me rises clear;
Her gracious shape I seem to see When'er the band plays "Le Désir!"

—Arlo Bates.

A Waltz Quadrille.

The band was playing a waltz quadrille.
I felt as light as a wind-blown feather,
As we floated away at the caller's will
Through the intricate mazy dance together.
Like a mimic army our lines were meeting,
Slowly advancing, and then retreating,
All decked in their bright array;
And back and forth to the music's rhyme
We moved together, and all the time
I knew you were going away.

The fold of your strong arm sent a thrill
From heart to brain as we gently glided
Like leaves on the waves of that waltz quadrille;
Parted, met, and again divided,
You drifting one way and I another,
Then suddenly turning and facing each other;
Then off in the blithe chassé,
Then airily back to our places swaying,
While every beat of the music seemed saying
That you were going away.

I said to my heart, "Let us take our fill
Of mirth and pleasure, and love and laughter,
For it all must end with this waltz quadrille,
And life will be never the same life after.
O! that the caller might go on calling—
O! that the music might go on falling—
Like a shower of silver spray—
While we whirled on to the vast forever,
Where no hearts break and no ties sever,
And no one goes away."

A clamor, a crash, and the band was still,
'Twas the end of the dream and the end of the measure;

The last low notes of that waltz quadrille
Like a dinge o'er the death of pleasure,
A night, and the spell was over—
A friend and too cold for a lover—
Nothing more to say;
A looked dim, and the dancers weary,
As was said, and the hall was dreary
As went away,
—Ella Wheeler.

LYDIA E. PINKHAM'S VEGETABLE COMPOUND.

Is a Positive Cure

For all those Painful Complaints and Weaknesses
so common to our best female population.A Medicine for Women. Invented by a Woman.
Prepared by a Woman.

The Greatest Medical Discovery Since the Dawn of History.

It revives the drooping spirits, invigorates and harmonizes the organic functions, gives elasticity and firmness to the step, restores the natural lustre to the eye, and plants on the pale cheek of woman the fresh roses of life's spring and early summer time.

Physicians Use It and Prescribe It Freely.

It removes faintness, flatulency, destroys all craving
for stimulant, and relieves weakness of the stomach.
That feeling of bearing down, causing pain, weight
and backache, is always permanently cured by its use.
For the cure of Kidney Complaints of either sex
this Compound is unsurpassed.

LYDIA E. PINKHAM'S BLOOD PURIFIER will eradicate every vestige of Humors from the Blood, and give tone and strength to the system, of man, woman or child. Insist on having it.

Both the Compound and Blood Purifier are prepared at 233 and 235 Western Avenue, Lynn, Mass. Price of either, $1. Six bottles for $5. Sent by mail in the form of pills, or of lozenges, on receipt of price, $1 per box for either. Mrs. Pinkham freely answers all letters of inquiry. Enclose 3c. stamp. Send for pamphlet.

No family should be without LYDIA E. PINKHAM'S
LIVER PILLS. They cure constipation, biliousness,
and torpidity of the liver. 25 cents per box.

Sold by all Druggists.

AYER'S HAIR VIGOR,

For Restoring Gray Hair to its Natural Vitality and Color.

Advancing years, sickness, care, disappointment, and hereditary predisposition, all turn the hair gray, and either of them incline it to shed prematurely.

AYER'S HAIR VIGOR, by long and extensive use, has proven that it stops the falling of the hair immediately; often renews the growth; and always surely restores its color when faded or gray. It stimulates the nutritive organs to healthy activity, and preserves both the hair and its beauty. Thus brashness, weak, or sickly hair becomes glossy, pliable, and grows with lively expression;
falling hair is checked and stabilized; thin hair thickens, and faded or gray hairs resume their original color. Its operation is sure and harmless. It cures dandruff, keeps the scalp cool, clean, and soft—under which conditions, diseases of the scalp are impossible.

As a Dressing for Ladies' Hair,

the VIGOR is praised for its grateful and agreeable perfume, and valued for the soft lustre and richness of tone it imparts.

PREPARED BY

DR. J. C. AYER & Co., Lowell, Mass.

PRACTICAL AND ANALYTICAL CHEMISTS.

Sold by all Druggists and Dealers in Medicines.

Hunyadi THE BEST NATURAL CHEAPEST

APERTIENT WATER. János
SUPERIOR TO ALL OTHER LAXATIVES.

"SPEEDY, SURE, & GENTLE."
Prof. Roberts, F.R.C.P. London.

The most certain and comfortable cathartic in cases of constipation and sluggish liver or piles.
Ordinary Dose, a Wineglassful before breakfast.
Of all Druggists and Mineral Water Dealers.

NONE GENUINE BUT WITH A BLUE LABEL.

FOR SALE BY

RUHL BROTHERS

522 Montgomery Street,

SAN FRANCISCO.

Write for Large Illustrated Catalogue.
Rifles, Shot Guns, Revolvers, sent p. o. for examination.

ONE MILLION COPIES SOLD!

Everybody Wants It!

Everybody Needs It!

KNOW THYSELF.

The untold miseries that result from indiscretions in early life may be alleviated and cured. Those who doubt this assertion should purchase the new medical work published
by the Peabody Medical Institute, Boston, Mass.

THE SCIENCE OF LIFE, OR SELF-PRESER- VATION.

Exhausted Vitality, Nervous and Physical Debility, Premature Decline in Man, of Vitality impaired by too close application to business, may be restored, and manhood regained.

Two hundred and fifty-eighth edition, revised and enlarged, just published. It is a standard medical work, the best in the English language, written by a physician of great experience, who was awarded a gold and jeweled medal by the National Medical Association. It contains beautiful and very expensive engravings, 300 pages, more than 125 valuable prescriptions for all forms of diseases,
acute and chronic, the result of many years of extensive
and successful practice, any one of which is worth ten times the price of the book. Bound in beautiful French cloth, embossed, gilt. Price, only $1.25, by mail, securely sealed, postpaid, on receipt of price. Illustrated
sample, 6 cents. Send now.

THE SCIENCE OF LIFE, OR SELF-PRESER- VATION.

Is beyond all comparison the most extraordinary work on Physiology ever published. There is nothing whatever that the married or single can either require or wish to know but what is fully explained.—London Lancet.

THE SCIENCE OF LIFE, OR SELF-PRESER- VATION.

Is a marvel of art and beauty, warranted to be a better
medical book in every sense than can be obtained elsewhere for double the price, or the money will be refunded in every instance.—Author.

N. B.—YOUNG AND MIDDLE-AGED MEN can save
much time, suffering, and expense by reading the Science of Life, or conferring with the author, who may be addressed on all diseases requiring skill and experience. Address

PEABODY MEDICAL INSTITUTE,

Or W. H. PARKER, M. D.,

4 Bulfinch Street, Boston, Mass.

POTOSI MINING COMPANY

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco,
California. Location of works, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Directors held on the 22d day of November, 1882, an assessment (No. 10), of twenty-five cents per share, was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately, in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 29, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on Wednesday, the twenty-seventh day of December, 1882, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction;
and unless payment is made before, will be sold on Wednesday, the 17th day of January, 1883, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

W. E. DEAN, Secretary.
Office—Room 79, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery
Street, San Francisco, Cal.

BEST AND BELCHER SILVER

Mining Company—Location of works, Virginia City, Storey County, Nevada. Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Directors, held on the eighth day (18th) of November, 1882, an assessment (No. 25) of Fifty (50c) Cents per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately, in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room No. 29, Nevada Block,
No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.
Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on Friday, the 22d day of December, 1882, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction; and unless payment is made before, will be sold on Thursday, the 17th day of January, 1883, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale.
By order of the Board of Directors.

Office—Room No. 29, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

CALIFORNIA MINING COMPANY.

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 21st day of November, 1882, an assessment (No. 6) of Twenty (20) Cents per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately, in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room No. 23, Nevada Block, No.
309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the 29th day of December, 1882, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and, unless payment is made before, will be sold on Friday, the 26th day of January, 1883, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale.
By order of the Board of Directors.

C. P. GORDON, Secretary.
Office—Room 23, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery St.,
San Francisco, Cal.

SIERRA NEVADA SILVER MINING

Company. Location of principal place of business
San Francisco, California—Location of works, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Trustees, held on the 8th day of December, 1882, an assessment (No. 75) of One Dollar per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, 209 Montgomery Street, Room 37, Nevada Block, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the eleventh day of January, 1883, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction, and, unless payment is made before, will be sold on Tuesday, the 30th day of January, 1883, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale.
By order of the Board of Directors.

E. L. PARKER, Secretary.
Office—Room 57, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery
Street, San Francisco, California.

30 DAYS' TRIAL FREE.

We send free on 30 days trial Dr. Dye's Electro-Voltaic Belts and other Electric appliances TO MEN suffering from Nervous Debility, Lost Vitality, and Kindred Troubles. Also, for Rheumatism, Liver and Kidney Troubles, and in many other diseases. Speedy cures guaranteed. Illustrated pamphlets free. Address
VOLTAIC BELT CO., Marshall, Mich.

THUNDER POWDER COMPANY.—

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco,
California; location of works, Alameda County, California.

Notice.—There are delinquent upon the following described stock, on account of assessment (No. 1) levied on the fifteenth day of August, 1882, the several amounts set opposite the names of the respective shareholders, as follows:

Name	Cert. No.	No. Shares.	Amount.
Charles DeLacy, Trustee....	37	10,000	$2 00
Charles DeLacy, Trustee....	37	200	4,000 00
Charles DeLacy, Trustee....	73	200	80 00
Charles DeLacy, Trustee....	74	300	120 00
Charles DeLacy, Trustee....	79	14,995	5,998 00
Charles DeLacy, Trustee....	87	6,000	2,400 00
F. M. Pixley, Trustee....	4	5	not issued 2 00
F. M. Pixley, Trustee....	5	995	do 398 00
W. W. Dodge, Trustee....	6	5	do 2 00
W. W. Dodge, Trustee....	7	995	do 398 00
E. G. Waite, Trustee....	8	5	do 2 00
E. G. Waite, Trustee....	9	2,495	do 998 00
Geo. W. Prescott, Trustee....	10	5	do 2 00
Geo. W. Prescott, Trustee....	11	995	do 398 00
Wm. Sherman, Trustee....	12	5	do 2 00
Wm. Sherman, Trustee....	13	2,495	do 998 00
R. M. Anthony, Trustee....	14	1,000	do 400 00
John A. Benson, Trustee....	15	2,000	do 800 00
Theodore Wagner, Trustee....	16	1,000	do 400 00
M. Balbridge, Trustee....	17	1,500	not issued 600 00
Fred'k Lux, Trustee....	18	1,000	do 400 00
Charles Camden, Trustee....	19	2,000	do 800 00
Jackston Hart, Trustee....	20	1,000	do 400 00
R. D. Lennox, Trustee....	22	500	do 200 00
Daniel Gorham, Trustee....	23	500	do 200 00
Theodore Greene, Trustee....	24	1,000	do 400 00
Eugene L. Sullivan, Trustee....	25	2,000	do 800 00
Walter Mead, Trustee....	26	500	not issued 200 00
J. H. Fish, Trustee....	27	500	do 200 00
T. E. Frasier, Trustee....	28	1,000	do 400 00
T. E. Frasier, Trustee....	29	1,000	do 400 00
T. E. Frasier, Trustee....	30	1,000	do 400 00
C. Kelly, Trustee....	31	1,000	do 400 00
Chas. F. Flick, Trustee....	32	5	do 2 00
Wm. F. Flick, Trustee....	33	5	do 2 00
Chas. H. Hopkins, Trustee....	34	5	do 2 00
Wm. Wilson, Trustee....	35	5	do 2 00
Benj. Teal, Trustee....	36	5	do 2 00
F. C. Kiel, Trustee....	52	1,000	do 400 00
F. C. Kiel, Trustee....	53	1,000	do 400 00
Wm. Heick, Trustee....	54	1,000	do 400 00
Wm. Heick, Trustee....	55	1,000	do 400 00
F. M. Pixley, Trustee....	56	1,000	not issued 400 00
John F. Baxter, Trustee....	57	3,000	do 1,200 00
David S. Sherman, Trustee....	58	3,000	do 1,200 00
W. H. Campbell, Trustee....	59	1,000	do 400 00
W. N. Bourne, Trustee....	60	500	do 200 00
Theodore Wagner, Trustee....	60	500	do 200 00
Geo. E. Barnes, Trustee....	62	200	do 80 00
Wm. Wilson, Trustee....	63	100	do 40 00
L. E. Crane, Trustee....	64	50	do 20 00
S. B. Herriman, Trustee....	65	50	do 20 00
A. P. Bauton, Trustee....	66	50	issued 20 00
W. W. Glazier, Trustee....	67	50	not issued 20 00
H. W. Newbauer, Trustee....	80	250	do 100 00
L. Hafen, Trustee....	81	250	do 100 00
Theodore Wagner, Trustee....	85	1,000	do 400 00
Matthew Clark, Trustee....	103	500	do 200 00
Jas. S. Porteous, Trustee....	110	500	do 200 00
Thos. Legg, Trustee....	104	100	do 40 00

And in accordance with law, and an order of the Board of Directors made on the fifteenth day of August, 1882, so many shares of each parcel of such stock as may be necessary to be sold at public auction at the company's office,
No. 606 Montgomery Street, Room 5, San Francisco, California, on Monday, the ninth day of October, 1882, at the hour of one o'clock P. M. of said day, to pay said delinquent assessment thereon, together with costs of advertising and expenses of the sale. C. M. OAKLEY, Secretary.

Office—Room 5, Sherman Building, No. 606 Montgomery
Street, San Francisco, California.

POSTPONEMENT.—The sale day of the above delinquent stock is hereby postponed until the sixteenth (16th) day of October, 1882, at the same place and hour. By order of the Board of Directors.

C. M. OAKLEY, Secretary.

POSTPONEMENT.—The sale day of the above delinquent stock is hereby postponed until the thirtieth (30th) day of October, 1882, at the same place and hour. By order of the Board of Directors.

C. M. OAKLEY, Secretary.

POSTPONEMENT.—The sale day of the above delinquent stock is hereby postponed until the sixth (6th) day of November, 1882, at the same place and hour. By order of the Board of Directors.

C. M. OAKLEY, Secretary.

POSTPONEMENT.—The sale day of the above delinquent stock is hereby postponed until the thirteenth (13th) day of November, 1882, at the same place and hour. By order of the Board of Directors.

C. M. OAKLEY, Secretary.

POSTPONEMENT.—The sale day of the above delinquent stock is hereby postponed until the twentieth (20th) day of November, 1882, at the same place and hour. By order of the Board of Directors.

C. M. OAKLEY, Secretary.

POSTPONEMENT.—The sale day of the above delinquent stock is hereby postponed until the twenty-seventh (27th) day of November, 1882, at the same place and hour.
By order of the Board of Directors.

C. M. OAKLEY, Secretary.

POSTPONEMENT.—The sale day of the above delinquent stock is hereby postponed until the eleventh (11th) day of December, 1882, at the same place and hour. By order of the Board of Directors.

C. M. OAKLEY, Secretary.

POSTPONEMENT.—The sale day of the above delinquent stock is hereby postponed until the second (2d) day of January, 1883, at the same place and hour. By order of the Board of Directors.

C. M. OAKLEY, Secretary.

POSTPONEMENT.—The sale day of the above delinquent stock is hereby postponed until the twentieth (20th) day of November, 1882, at the same place and hour. By order of the Board of Directors.

C. M. OAKLEY, Secretary.

POSTPONEMENT.—The sale day of the above delinquent stock is hereby postponed until the twenty-seventh (27th) day of November, 1882, at the same place and hour.

R. H. McDonald,
President,
San Francisco,
Cal.

PACIFIC BANK
Established
1863.
Capital Stock
$1,000,000.00
Surplus 460,800.70

San Francisco, Cal., July 1, 1882.

We take pleasure in presenting for your consideration the following Thirty-eighth Semi-Annual Statement of the condition of this Bank:

RESOURCES.
Bank Premises.....	$150,000 00
Other Real Estate.....	12,825 35
United States Bonds.....	623,507 60
Land Association Stock.....	15,121 65
Loans and Discounts.....	1,753,000 20
Due from Banks.....	527,279 09
Money on hand.....	632,365 30
LIABILITIES.	$3,752,099 09
Capital paid up.....	$1,000,000 00
Surplus.....	460,800 70
Due Depositors.....	1,933,672 80
Due Banks.....	337,491 09
Dividends unpaid.....	134 50
	$3,752,099 09

This Bank has special facilities for doing all kinds of banking business.

OF THIS
Advertisement
A Splendid Timekeeper.

TO Every Reader

In order to advertise HOUSE AND HOME, and secure subscribers promptly, we have decided to make the following most princely and magnificent offer to each and every reader of this paper. It is the common practice of the gold and silver refiners of England and Switzerland to purchase from the pawnbrokers of their respective countries all the good and silver watches which have been surrendered, simply for the sake of the gold and silver cases. The works are then sold to a celebrated watch firm who have made a specialty of this business. This firm places the works in the hands of skillful workmen, who set to work and put them in as good condition as possible. These works embrace every variety of movement, some of them being very fine and perfect timekeepers all handsomely cased. We have just purchased the entire stock (25,000) of a bankrupt concern of the above described watches at less than the first cost of the raw material.

On receipt of $1.50, the subscription price of HOUSE AND HOME, and $1.00 extra to pay for packing, postage, and register, we will send HOUSE AND HOME for one year (2 numbers), at one of these watches, prepaid to any address in the United States. Watchman will deliver the order is received. The watches are purchased at a price to go with HOUSE AND HOME, and will be furnished only to the subscribers to that publication. In case of introduction it is at once we make this unusual offer, which could not be made were it not for the fact that we bought the watches at one quarter cost of manufacture.

On receipt of 50 cents extra we will send our new and elegant watch-chain with a white gold charm and dog call attachment—just the thing for ladies and sporting men.

SATISFACTION GUARANTEED.

Remember, any one sending us money for HOUSE AND HOME on the above offer, who can do so, say that they are not satisfied with their bargain, can have their money cheerfully refunded.

Address METROPOLITAN PUBLISHING CO.,
252 Broadway, New York City.

WHAT THEY SAY OF US.

West Point, N. Y., Oct. 17, 1882. Metropolitan Publishing Company. Gent: I am in receipt of the handsome premium watch which you have sent me. I was much surprised to know that you could supply me with a timekeeper for so little money. HOUSE AND HOME is worth the price. Enclosed please find six (6) new subscribers at $1.50 each. Please send me 6 premium watches the same as the last. Very truly yours, Ed. and S. Farrow, U. S. Army.

Fredericboro, Tenn., Sept. 20, 1882. Gent: Watch arrived. All right in timekeeping quality. Best W. Sparks, Jr.

Paul, Minn., Sept. 14. Premium received, and a nice one. Gen. R. W. Johnson, Wrightstown, Minn., Sept. 20, '82. Received premium last night. Well satisfied. Martin Goodale. Testimonials like the above received every day.

N. B.—The popular and beautiful weekly publication known as HOUSE AND HOME illustrated newspaper, is one of the best and most elegantly illustrated weekly newspapers of the day, full of new, Art, Science, Fashion, Music, Poetry, Charming Stories, Wit and Humor, Useful Knowledge, and amusement for every American home. In fact, a pictorial history of the world from week to week—light hearted, fully illustrated pages—same size as Harper's or the Illustrated.

J. C. MERRILL & CO.,
Shipping and Commission Merchants
204 and 206 California Street,
SAN FRANCISCO.

The Regular Dispatch line of Packets to Honolulu, H. I.

FAMILIES
LEAVING THE CITY.
FURNITURE, TRUNKS, PIANOS,
PICTURES, CARPETS stored and taken care of.
Having no rent to pay, we store goods low. Advances made. References, dating back 21 years, given.
H. WINDEL & CO. 310 Stockton Street.

NOVELTIES

FOR THE HOLIDAYS.

LOUIS BRAVERMAN & CO.

119 MONTGOMERY STREET,

Invite public attention to the finest and best selected stock of Novelties in WATCHES, DIAMONDS, JEWELRY, SILVERWARE, and FRENCH CLOCKS ever exhibited here. Direct importation in every branch enables us to sell goods at lower prices than any house in the city.

Every description of fine DIAMOND WORK and JEWELRY manufactured to order.

STORE OPEN EVERY EVENING DURING DECEMBER.

Importation for 1881,

30,835 CASES.

Importation for 1882,

Will exceed
35,000 CASES.

Fresh shipments of this favorite brand of Champagne constantly received by the Agents.

WOLFF & RHEINHOLD, 506 Battery Street.

THE CALIFORNIA FURNITURE MANUFACTURING COMPANY

invite the public to visit their

WAREROOMS, 220 TO 226 BUSH STREET,

And inspect their

NEW GOODS

Which constitute

THE FINEST DISPLAY OF FURNITURE

Ever shown on this Coast, and which cannot be excelled for Variety and Beauty upon this Continent.

Bring your Friends along. The Rich can gratify their Tastes; the Poor can supply their Wants.

THE CALA. FURNITURE MFG CO., 220 TO 226 BUSH ST.

FOR FINE HOLIDAY WINES,
J. CUNDLACH & CO.
Cor. Market and Second,
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

IT STANDS AT THE HEAD

THE STAR THAT LEADS THEM ALL

UNQUALIFIED FOR SIMPLICITY

THE LIGHT RUNNING

DOMESTIC SEWING MACHINE

J. W. EVANS,
General Agent, 29 Post Street, S. F.

J. M. LITCHFIELD & CO.
MERCHANT TAILORS,
And Dealers in Gents' Furnishing Goods,
415 MONTGOMERY STREET,
Bet. California and Sacramento San Francisco

"IT IS ALMOST HUMAN."
THE NORTON
DOOR-CHECK AND SPRING.

D. S. BROWN & CO., No. 36 California Street,
Sole Agents for Pacific Coast.

CHARLES R. ALLEN
Wholesale and Retail COAL Order for House or Office by Dealer in Telephone 308.
Agent Pittsburg Coal Mining Company.
118 and 120 Beale Street, S. F.

JOHN MIDDLETON,
COAL DEALER,
10 POST STREET,
.....AND.....
718 SANSOME STREET.
Coal at Lowest Market Rates.

GEORGE MORROW & CO.
(Established 1854.)

HAY, GRAIN, AND
COMMISSION MERCHANTS

SHIPPING ORDERS A SPECIALTY.

39 Clay Street,

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

ART-PAINTED, PLAIN and GLAZED

TILES

For Decorations.

W. W. MONTAGUE & CO.
110 to 118 Battery Street.

CRUSHED INDIAN.

A NEW AND DELICIOUS PREPARATION
FROM CORN, FOR BREAKFAST. IT COOKS
THOROUGHLY IN A FEW MINUTES.

TRY IT.
FOR SALE BY ALL
GROCERS.

The Argonaut.

VOL. XI. NO. 27.

SAN FRANCISCO, DECEMBER 30, 1882.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

WHY QUIMBY SWORE OFF.

A New Year's Tale, which contains an Important Moral.

Jack Quimby awoke with a bad headache. This was no new sensation to Mr. Quimby. It was old as the eternal hills, for Jack was a bibulous soul, and his head was not proportionate to his inclination for strong waters. He loved drink, not for its own sake, but for the mad merriment the howl provoked, the song, the jest, and the anecdote, the maudlin fraternal embrace, and the pledges of everlasting friendship. He occupied a responsible position in a Front Street office—for, despite his deep and insatiable thirst, Quimby was an excellent man of business.

"I look," said Mr. Quimby, as he ruefully surveyed his crimson countenance in a hand-glass, "I look like a bled owl. Or the last run of shad. Or the breaking up of a hard winter. This won't do; I'll have to swear off, or the cold and silent grave will soon claim this manly form for its own," and Jack's eyes suffused with tears, for the fumes of the last round of night-caps were by no means dissipated.

"There never was a better Christian ruined by drink than the undersigned," he continued, and then, as his eyes lit on a bottle on the bureau, he said, with a deep sigh of gratitude, "Thank heaven, there is a snifter left to brace up on."

Mr. Quimby's toilet was slow and painful this morning. He looked at the cold water with a shudder, but finally worked himself up to the washing point. He was a long time in getting his collar buttoned, he dared not shave, though he usually performed that office every day, and he marked with a groan that a new pimple had taken its place on his forehead.

"Clearly," said Quimby, "I must swear off. There are only five days left of December. Then the new year and piety," and, much consoled by the self-promised reform, he left his room to make a feeble apology for a breakfast. A few hours later and Mr. Quimby was himself again. It had taken much artificial aid to bring his restoration about, but Mr. Quimby played the good Samaritan to himself with the most liberal cheerfulness. "A hair of the dog," was one of his most cherished maxims. The trouble was that he began with the hair, and usually concluded with the whole hide.

"If," he often remarked to his confidants, "I could keep cold sober for twenty-four hours together, I do not think I would find much trouble in swearing off." And then he'd recite "The Vagabonds" with tears streaming down his cheeks, and dwell with infinite pathos on the lines:

"You should have seen these classic features—
You need not scoff, sir. I was not then
Such a burning libel upon God's creatures—
I was one of your handsome men."

Despite his potations he was handsome, and the burning libel part of the poem, so far as he was concerned, was purely imaginary.

Two young and pretty girls sat in a handsome mansion on California Street. It was not Nob Hill, but near enough to breathe the aristocratic atmosphere of that locality. One, a blonde, was making a mouchoir case for a New Year's present. And on the lid her fair fingers were embroidering the initials J. Q.

"I can not imagine how you endure that fellow, Alice," said the other. "He never comes near me without reminding me of a spice factory. Why, he must exist on cloves, and cinnamon, and that sort of thing. I am sure he drinks. I have heard him talk so strangely, and one night he began a song, and burst out crying in the middle of it. Bob had to take him into the hall. He could hardly walk. Bob said it was his emotions, but I am sure it was whisky, or some horrid drink."

"Nonsense," said Alice Benton. "Jack is so finely strung that the least thing affects him. He is a dear fellow, is Jack. So good-bearded and clever. They adore him at the club."

"Perhaps so," rejoined her friend; "but it must take a fortune to keep him in clothes. By-by. I must get down town to match that lace." And with one of those natty little love-you-for-your-mother kisses that girls exchange, Bessie Morris skipped away.

Alice put another stitch in the curl of the J, and examined it critically. Then she sighed, put her work aside, and fell into a fit of dejected musing. "Jack does drink horribly," she said; "I wish I was not so fond of him." Then, repentantly, her woman's loyalty asserting itself, "That is, I mean I wish I could cure him. Yet he has so often promised me to swear off, as he calls it; but I fear swear off and swear on are all the same to poor Jack. I am running a fearful risk, they tell me, in marrying him. But what can I do? I can not give him up. I would not if I could. And I can not reform him." And Alice, in true feminine fashion, began to cry.

"Tears, idle tears, I know not what ye mean," cried a merry voice in her ear, and a tall, manly young fellow caught away her hands, and laughed heartily at her look of angry distress. "How now, coz," he said, soothingly, "what has gone wrong? Are there to be no calls this year? Does the stern papa legislate that the basket shall be hung on the outer wall, and no beau allowed to taste our cake and wine? Out with it. Tell me all, and, yonder drowsy policeman on the corner, I swear to right your wrongs."

"Ob, Charley," said his cousin, "it is all about Jack. You know his irregular habits—that's what you men call it, I believe. I must make him stop drinking. Charley, dear, you are a man; do give me some advice."

Charley grew grave in a moment. "You are right, Alice," he said. "We must put our heads together to save Jack Quimby. And if for your sake alone, dear girl, I shall sit awake all night thinking how it can be done. Give me twelve hours to concoct some scheme that shall bring Jack out of the mire, and make his frequent 'swear-offs' of some permanent value. Now, don't fret any more. Finish that pretty thing, and send it to him. I must away to seek counsel. Farewell, and joy be with you." And he rushed away in time to spring on a dummy, at the risk of death or mutilation.

"If it can be done, Charley will do it," said Alice, cheerfully. "O Jack, Jack, if you could but understand how much trouble you are giving us."

* * * * *

Jack Quimby saw the old year out and the new year in according to the usual fashion of such ceremonies. And he awoke with the same old head, only intensified by deeper and more varied potations. While he was deliberating whether it was worth while getting up at all or not, a knock came at his door, immediately followed by a couple of young fellows, faultlessly dressed in the regulation visiting costume.

"Come, come, Jack! You're a nice fellow for a calling chum. Over forty visits to make to-day, and you not up yet," and they dragged the unfortunate roysterer from his bed, and watched his hurried efforts at dressing with uproarious mirth.

"Deuce take you both," said Jack; "didn't you bring an eye-opener to help a fellow out?" The eye-opener was produced, in the shape of a pocket-flask, and under its cheering influence Mr. Quimby was soon ready for the road. We shall not follow him to the various houses he favored with his presence. He was conscientious about drinking the health of his fair hostesses, individually and collectively, and it was quite late in the evening before the Quimby carriage halted before Judge Benton's door. Alice had been anxiously expecting him all day, but when a gush of clove preceded his entrance, her heart sank within her. Jack felt the importance of presenting a sober appearance, and his how was cold, almost stern, and full of the most preternatural gravity.

"I wish you, Miss Benton, the compliments of the season," he said, in slow and deliberate accents. There was not a solitary r in this sentence, for Mr. Quimby knew from past experience the dangers surrounding that consonant at this stage of the proceedings. "Judge, I am delighted to see you looking so well," and this time the bow was directed to a stiff, high-backed chair, an heirloom in the Benton family.

"Sit down, Jack, and don't be silly," whispered Alice, after greeting his friends. "Oh, you wicked boy! what's the matter with your eyes? And your necktie has slipped up under your ear. How your gloves are stained with claret!"

"Vintage of '42, Miss Benton," said Mr. Quimby, with a pronounced hiccough. "And he quaffed off the cold, black wine"—but excuse me, am I mistaken in supposing that you asked me for a song?"

"Now, do be quiet, Jack, and don't sing," and she pushed an easy-chair toward her demoralized visitor, who sank into it with a deep groan, and declared in a sepulchral voice that if her father, the judge, would step his way, he should like to make his will, as he felt the chill of the tomb stealing over him, and dwelt in the shadow of the dark angel's wings. Half an hour later Mr. Quimby was supported to his carriage, and Alice registered a solemn vow that unless her cousin's plan was conclusively and permanently effective, she would never see Mrs. Quimby, if she had to live and die an old maid.

* * * * *

On the evening of Mr. Quimby's calls, half a dozen young fellows sat together in the private rooms of a well-known restaurant. Alice Benton's cousin was the chairman.

"Boys," he said, "we must all of us make a raid upon Quimby to-morrow. You, Jack, will be the deeply insulted husband, and you, Tom, the honest viticulturist whose money Quimby has horrowed and squandered. Dick, I want you to play the undertaker from whom the coffin was engaged, and Bill, you can appear as the man assaulted by Quimby—the angry man, who has determined to appeal to the laws of his country for redress in the shape of heavy damages. The office group will now rehearse."

The conspirators agreed, and Charley Elmore gave them their parts, and insisted upon a full-dress rehearsal before the close of the session. The boys were all of them keenly alive to the situation, and besides their ambition to carry out the joke, felt that it was really a serious matter, as tending to lead to Jack Quimby's permanent swear-off.

"It is his last chance," said Elmore. "I tell you, boys, if we don't cure him this time saltpetre won't save him, and we shall never dance at Alice Benton's wedding, so far as Jack Quimby is concerned." And the boys all swore they would do their level best.

It was a bold plan, but among Mr. Quimby's many failings they knew that forgetfulness was one of the most prominent, and that he seldom remembered in the morning the occurrences that took place over night.

* * * * *

When Jack Quimby awoke on the second day of the year, he had a vague idea that he was on the threshold of spontaaneous combustion. "Never," he groaned, "were my copers so infernally hot before. If I do not join some temperance legion ere the day is over, I am a lost man." Despite these reflections Mr. Quimby dressed himself, and, after a good round of stiff cocktails, walked to his office and fell into the regular business groove.

"Great Scott, Quimby!" said one of the clerks, "what a head you've got on you. Well, you must have been going the pace, yesterday. I say, old man, you ought to get to bed just as soon as you possibly can." But Quimby scowled at the junior, and went on adding up figures as if he felt as fresh as the morning, and even tried a popular air in a subdued whistle, to prove to the crowd that the preceding day had been one of undisturbed virtue.

"Quimby," said the senior partner of the firm, "I want that invoice made out by ten o'clock."

"All right, sir; am at work on it now."

"Somebody for you, Mr. Quimby," cried the messenger-boy, bursting into the private office.

"Show him in," said Quimby. A tall, gaunt individual followed the boy, and, fixing a stony glance on Jack, took a vacant chair.

"Of course, you know who I am, Mr. Quimby?"

"I'm blessed if I do," replied Jack, after a close scrutiny;

"never saw you before in my life, that I can remember."

"My name," said the visitor, "is Eutropius Brown, and I have brought you the coffin you ordered last evening. If you show me to the deceased, Mr. Quimby, I will arrange everything without further delay. I believe you remarked the corpse had been already two days on ice."

Quimby looked at his visitor aghast, and then darted to the window. Sure, enough, there stood a black wagon outside the door.

"My dear sir," he said, "there is nobody dead in this house. This is a business house, and you are quite mistaken about the address. I never ordered a coffin from you. I've got no one to bury, and—and it strikes me," added Jack, growing desperate, "that you are altogether in error—in fact, that you are not quite right in your mind."

"Is not your name John Quimby?"

"It is; I'm Quimby; hut, great heavens! I have no use for an undertaker!"

"Then why," said Brown, in an excited voice, "why did you come last night to my establishment and ring the night-hell? Why did you tell me to bring along, the first thing in the morning, the noblest casket in the shop? Do you think that is fair treatment for a decent undertaker, Mr. Quimby. Do you think—"

"For the Lord's sake, be quiet," gasped Jack. "Here is five dollars for a New Year's present. Say no more about it. Take your casket back, and I will call on you this afternoon and square up the balance. Don't you see that I was not myself when I spoke to you about that interment? Now, go away like a good fellow," and Jack pushed Mr. Brown out, and sat down again to his invoices with a heavy heart.

"How full I must have been," he muttered. "To order a coffin; why, that's the worst I ever did. I wish I could remember something about what happened after I left Benton's. But I can't; 'tis no use; I'm a wretched swine, and not long for this world. I'm—"

"Gentleman wants to see Mr. Quimby," shrieked the messenger.

"Don't disturb yourself, Mr. Quimby," cried a short, stout man, with a bull neck. "Just ten thirty. Came to give you your lesson as per contract," and swinging a sack from his back, he took out a set of boxing-gloves, and smiled complacently at the astonished Quimby.

"What the devil are you doing here?" ejaculated that dividual, as soon as he recovered his breath.

"Your boxing lesson, Mr. Quimby. Contract drawn up, the sir, last night. Signed in the presence of Mr. Elmore, at Hours from ten to twelve every day, at this office. Set get for yourself." And the pugilist handed Jack a paper on which his own signature appeared, with Elmore and several others as witnesses, to an agreement between Sam Slogem of the first part, and John Quimby of the second part, wherein it was agreed that said Slogem should instruct said Quimby in the manly art of self-defense, between the hours of ten and twelve at his Front Street office, at two dollars and fifty cents a lesson.

"Here's five dollars," said Quimby; "take it for your trouble, Mr. Slogem, and come about the latter end of next week." And as the pugilist put his gloves away, and walked off, Jack clasped his hands about his head, and fell into a train of serious thought.

"I've been off," he said, "but never so off as I was yesterday. A coffin and boxing lessons—where the deuce could I have been, anyhow?"

"Let me in; I must see him! Damn him! I'll kill him, the cowardly scoundrel! He insulted my wife! I say, let me in; I'll have his life!" The voice and the scuffle were outside Mr. Quimby's door.

"Impossible, sir, impossible. Mr. Quimby is a man, and never, knowingly, insulted any one."

This was quite enough for Jack. He felt a shiver over, and, seizing his cane and hat, shot down the stairs.

"Where are you going, Mr. Quimby?" asked

"To hell!" shouted Jack. "The whole world here with coffins, and boxing-gloves, and insulted crazy—plum crazy! Out of my way, or I'll kill you!" And the wretched man darted into the street, sprang into a hack, and fell back on the seat in a condition of complete exhaustion.

On the third day of January Miss Alice Benton was informed that Mr. John Quimby craved audience of her.

"Why, Jack, how pale you are, and how miserable you look," she exclaimed, as Mr. Quimby made her a very humble bow, and cast on her a glance full of the most imploring penitence.

"Alice," he said, "do you remember New Year's day?"

"Of course I do."

"I called on you, Alice."

"Certainly you did, Jack; and sang a song, too. Don't you remember?"

"Remember; yes, quite well—at least, I think I do. But after that, Alice, after that?"

"Come, Jack, don't look so horror-stricken. What occurred after that?"

"Heaven alone knows. I only know about half, and there must be a hundred precincts yet to hear from. I went to an undertaker and ordered a coffin; I invited a huiuser to call at my office during business hours and spar with me; I insulted somebody's wife; I borrowed money from every one in town, and there were thirty-two creditors waiting to see me in the hall yesterday; I have seven pairs of boots making for me in various parts of the town; I have bought land, ships, co-partnerships, grain, clothes, guns—in fact, Alice, I find that, heaving your pardon, the devil has got such a mortgage on me that he took possession of this poor carcass on New Year's night, and I have come to swear off, once and forever."

"On what will you swear, Jack? Now, mind you, this is a serious matter. You never acknowledged before that such a necessity existed. Shall I get the Bible?"

"I'll swear on your lips, sweetheart," said Mr. Quimby, gallantly, and right lustily did he take the oath. "It's high time, darling," he continued, "when a man mistakes an undertaker shop for a saloon, it's high time to turn over a new leaf."

And Charley Elmore was Quimby's best man at the wedding; but from that day to this Jack never suspected that he was the victim of a reformatory conspiracy.

DAN. O'CONNELL.

SAN FRANCISCO, December, 1882.

The following census bulletin shows in detail the number of persons over ten years of age in the United States and Territories who are returned at the last census as unable to read:

	Unable to read.	Per cent.
Alabama.....	370,279	43.5
Arizona.....	5,490	10.7
Arkansas.....	153,229	28.8
California.....	48,583	7.1
Colorado.....	9,321	5.9
Connecticut.....	20,986	4.2
Dakota.....	3,094	3.1
Delaware.....	16,912	15.3
District of Columbia.....	21,541	15.7
Florida.....	70,219	38.0
Georgia.....	446,683	42.8
Idaho.....	1,384	5.5
Illinois.....	96,809	4.3
Indiana.....	70,008	4.8
Iowa.....	28,117	2.4
Kansas.....	25,503	3.6
Kentucky.....	258,186	22.2
Louisiana.....	297,312	45.8
Maine.....	18,181	3.5
Maryland.....	111,387	16.0
Massachusetts.....	75,635	5.3
Michigan.....	47,112	3.8
Minnesota.....	20,551	3.7
Mississippi.....	315,012	41.9
Missouri.....	138,818	8.9
Montana.....	1,530	4.8
Nebraska.....	7,830	2.5
Nevada.....	3,793	7.3
New Hampshire.....	11,682	4.2
New Jersey.....	39,136	4.5
New Mexico.....	52,994	60.2
New York.....	166,635	4.2
North Carolina.....	367,890	38.3
Ohio.....	86,754	3.6
Oregon.....	5,370	4.1
Pennsylvania.....	146,138	4.6
Rhode Island.....	17,456	7.9
South Carolina.....	321,780	46.2
Tennessee.....	294,385	27.7
Texas.....	250,223	24.1
Utah.....	4,851	5.0
Vermont.....	12,993	4.9
Virginia.....	350,495	34.0
Washington.....	3,791	5.7
West Virginia.....	52,041	12.1
Wisconsin.....	38,693	4.0
Wyoming.....	427	2.6
Number unable to read.....	4,923,451
Percentage for United States.....	13.4

al number unable to read.....4,923,451

centage for United States.....13.4

The crown of England is a costly "hauble," bedazzled with jewels enough to found three or four public charities, or a half-dozen ordinary colleges. There are twenty diamonds round the circle, worth $7,500 each, making $150,000; two large centre diamonds, $10,000 each, making $20,000; fifty-four smaller diamonds, placed at the angle of the former, each $500; four crosses, each composed of twenty-five diamonds, $60,000; four large diamonds on the top of the crosses, $20,000; twelve diamonds contained in the fleur-de-lis, $50,000; eighteen smaller diamonds contained in the same, $10,000; pearls, diamonds, etc., upon the arches and crosses, $50,000; also, one hundred and forty-one small diamonds, $25,000; twenty-six diamonds in the upper cross, $15,500; two circles of pearls about the rim, $15,000. The cost of the stones in the crown, exclusive of the metal, is, therefore, nearly half a million of dollars.

Two sons of an English aristocrat were remarkable for their temper, which on certain occasions broke out in very indiscreet expressions. During a quarrel, and in the height of passion, one said to the other: "You are the best ass in the world." "Come, come, my lads," said the highly incensed father; "you forget that I am present."

VANITY FAIR.

Miss Chamberlaine, of Ohio, says a correspondent of the Washington Capital, has the unenviable reputation of having succeeded Mrs. Langtry in the good graces of the Prince of Wales. The American is not as beautiful as the Jersey Lily, but she is "American" in her manners, and that makes her attractive to his royal highness. A man who is so unfortunate as to be horn prince is a martyr to conventionality, and when he finds some one who treats him as though he was no holier than any other man, he is refreshed. The Prince of Wales saw Miss Chamberlaine at a ball, and he was pleased with her appearance, and sent to know if she would honor him with a dance. "Dance with the Prince of Wales, indeed I will. Who wouldn't he delighted to dance with the Prince of Wales?" The message was delivered as it was sent, and the prince was charmed. Even the princess sent word to have the American brought to her. "If the Princess of Wales wants to know me, let her come to me; I'm not going to her," said Miss Chamberlaine. This message was not delivered, and the introduction was effected later in the evening. Miss Chamberlaine treated the princess with the easy familiarity that had won the prince; but her royal highness did not like it, and when the American girl retired she remarked to one of her attendants that she was "an impertinent minx." However, Miss Chamberlaine and her friend, Miss Work, were invited to Sandringham by the princess, and they went there and had a "jolly time." They even went further. They went to Homburg with the prince, and without any chaperon, which was very wrong; but I don't think that any one has accused them of being more than wild. They called it a "lark," and thought it great fun to have the Prince of Wales for a cavalier. He was with them all the time. They drove together, played lawn-tennis, and had a good time. Everybody talked about them, and they were among the sights. Though the prince and the Americans were the subject of general conversation, they were indifferent. Ladies were a little shy of the two girls, and they deserved to be snubbed, though they meant no harm. At last their pictures got in the papers, standing on the balcony with the prince. The princess saw it, and when they came back to London she is said to have given Miss Chamberlaine the cut direct.

They collect locks of hair now—gentlemen's hair. It is no particular compliment if a young lady these days asks you for a lock of your hair. If you grant the request the lock will be tied with a blue ribbon and go into the "hair album" along with the hair of a crowd of other fellows. Over it will be written your name, age, color of your eyes, date of receiving the lock, and general remarks as to personal appearance, etc., which may or may not be complimentary, as the "hair album" is never to be seen by other than feminine eyes.

Northern fashions are creeping into Virginia life, says a correspondent of the Philadelphia Press. Richmond girls are no longer allowed to go to balls and parties unchaperoned. Duennas appear at all places of entertainment, and Miss Virginia runs to the shelter of her mamma's wing after a dance with as much modesty as does her Philadelphia cousin. Engagements are announced as soon as contracted. As soon as the momentous question is asked the fiancés are allowed full liberty to walk, drive, and sit together; the income, domestic arrangements, etc., are discussed in the presence of third parties with a charming freedom. The young lady selects her own engagement ring with a keen eye to a good investment. There was a time when an engagement meant delicious stolen interviews, blushes, denials; but not now, not now! At any rate there is one advantage—people don't flirt these days. Having received a visit from one's mother-in-law (in prospectu) and heard what Adolphus likes for breakfast, and on the other hand, been interrogated as to one's income and one's temper, the contractors are apt to abide by their engagements, rather than the risk of undergoing their examinations under similar circumstances. Richmond girls are pretty enough considered collectively, but there is no pronounced belle or beauty. Perhaps the most admired girl in the city is a sweet-faced, dowerless maiden, with a long pedigree, who made her debut with startling success at the White Sulphur last summer. Perhaps the halcyon days are coming when, if one is only good, it will make no difference about one's looks. If so, the millennium is close at hand, and men's hearts are changed. But there is blooming in the retirement of the school-room a young girl whose exquisite form and face will bring back the days when to be the beauty of Richmond meant to be the beauty of the continent. Last winter and the winter before there was a renaissance of learning here. Everybody went to school, people talked about the origin of species and the color of Lady Macbeth's eyes. But, as is the case with all violent reform measures, reaction has taken place. We still read the Popular Science Monthly, but we do not blush to acknowledge an interest in the shape of bonnets, and a little natural feeling of exultation that circulars are still worn.

"I doubt," says a writer in Progress, "if we know as thoroughly how to enjoy ourselves indoors as the English do. Not referring, mind you, to great parties, receptions, and dances, but when nobody save the family, and one or two friends, with whom it is not required to stand on ceremony, are present. For such evenings the English have all manner of games, many of them regular romps. If the elder people do not join in, they enjoy themselves as much as the youngsters do in looking on at the pranks. It is seldom that a miss of eighteen or a nobby beau of twenty considers himself too dignified to take part. We Americans could well follow suit here."

In materials for gentlemen's suits, plain beavers, mixed worsteds, diagonals, fine checks, and indistinct patterns, shot with color, known as corkscrews, not unlike the fabrics used last spring, are prevailing ones. The standard coats are the sack and cutaway, made single or double-breasted. In sacks the four-button predominates. For elegance of style the five-button, single-breasted cutaways take precedence over all others. They are cut with high collar, close, shapely back, and when well fitted are becoming to young and old, slight or portly figures. All frocks are double-breasted, the single breast having been relegated to oblivion before the leaves were turned. Vests for the most part are of the same material as the coat, although the agreement with the lower garment is not indicative of poor taste. All are cut high, as in the last two seasons, except that in the full dress suit the regulation three-button style prevails, showing a very broad expanse of shirt-front. Nothing new is offered in overcoats. What has become of ulsters, it is difficult to say. Trousers are cut alarmingly tight, and the question of the hour seems to be, how is one to get them off when entrance has once been made? The cut now in vogue is not only tight, but it continues to grow tighter, until soon there will be but one alternative, fashion or the stitches must weaken. Design of fabric is of no consideration. Stripes, blocks, checks, mottled or plain goods are all sanctioned by fashion, provided they are tight. In hats, the Dunlap flat top, heveled hrim, has a large patronage, notwithstanding the air of depression it gives to the wearer. In silk hats, vulgarly, yet tersely, named "plug," there is no material change. Collars and cuffs are just as they should be. The low hand collars, whether turned or standing, meet well in front in square or round collars, covering some of those scrawny, unsightly necks that never should be exposed, whatever the fashion. Cuffs are square and round cornered, little stitched, modestly buttoned, and neither extravagant in width nor depth. In neck wear, cuts are similar to those shown in the summer and fall, save the dignity of low, mellow tones, which have been ruthlessly set aside for the glaring designs wrought in the most startling colors in the chromatic scale. Latest devices in plush and brocade velvet of the most intense vividness bid fair to have a heavy run. Gloves of all descriptions are heavily seamed with black silk cord. Seal brown, myrtle green, and tan, but no black, are the proper colors for street wear. Buckskin finds less favor than castor, and undressed kid is greatly in demand. Gaudy stockings in stripes, plaids, and spots are plentiful. Balbriggan and fine imports come in tasteful shades, lined with fleece.

Many of Nice's fashionable guests, said a correspondent of the London World, have not returned yet; for example, Comtesse Chambrun, Comtesse d'Adhemar, Comtesse Braniska, Comtesse du Chastel, Comtesse de Wézule, Lady Macdonald, Mrs. Stokes Boyd, the American beauty, as well as Mrs. Wurtz Dundas, likewise an American of considerable beauty. These ladies are regular winter residents, and in consequence of their absence some difficulty in starting the round of fashionable events is experienced. Their arrival is, however, a question of a few days.

Ribbon work is being revived. It was one of the pretty conceits of the age of Louis VI., and its revival is due to English influence and the enthusiasm of the South Kensington School. It is not an easy matter to give an exact description of this, because so much depends upon individual taste, imitation, instinct, and the power of observation. The ribbons used should not be wider than half an inch—so delicately shaded that almost the entire decoration can be made of them. The work is done by passing the ribbon through the material intended to be embroidered—satin, plush, etc.—and fastening them down into pretty forms. Being narrow, a very small hole is sufficient to allow them to pass through; in fact, the hole may be made large enough by an embroidery needle the right size. The ribbons are in relief, the edges being folded, twisted, crumpled, and carefully caught down into position. Flowers are the designs generally used; the wild rose, dahlia, or any thick-leaved flower, best answers the purpose. To heighten the effect embroidery is frequently introduced; for instance, French knots in the centre. It must be added that ribbon work should be, above all, elegantly dainty in design and finish, for clumsiness in the execution spoils it completely.

The attempts to reinstate the crinoline are continued, but as those most concerned, the ladies, oppose it and the fashion papers ridicule it, it is hardly probable that anything will come of it. It is charged that crinoline is woefully in the way on all occasions, and that its advantages are positively nil. Among the novelties in pretty "nothings" is a small whistle of beaten silver. It is to be used by ladies in hailing street-cars. Since the question, "Shall women whistle?" has been under such active discussion the fair ones are actually timid of puckering their pretty mouths; so the mechanical whistle may prove a very useful toy.

"Learning," says a writer in an Eastern journal, "that there was a place in the city where dimples were made to order, I went there out of curiosity. I was shown into a parlor somewhat resembling a dentist's operating-room. There was a glass case full of bottles, washes, and wigs, and a regular dentist's chair that suggested a world of comfort. To me presently came a dapper little man in a velvet cutaway coat, and whose face wore a complacent smirk. I hashfully suggested the dimple question, and asked for some points. I really wanted a dimple in my arm, and told him so. But I insinuated my disbelief in his ability to produce the necessary article. Whereupon he convinced me by practice. This is how it is done: My arm being bare and the exact spot indicated, he placed a small glass tube, the orifice of which was extremely small, upon the spot. This tube had working within it a piston, and was so small that when the handle was drawn up the air was exhausted from the tube and it adhered to the flesh, raising a slight protuberance. Around this raised portion the operator daintily tied a bit of scarlet silk, and then took away his suction-machine. The little point of skin that was thus raised he sliced off with a wicked-looking knife, bringing the blood. I tried hard not to scream, but it was so unexpected that I had too. Then he bound up the arm, placing over the wound a small silver object like an inverted cone, the point of which was rounded and polished. This little point was adjusted so as to depress the exact centre of the cut. Then he told me to go away and not touch the spot until the next day. When I came at that time he dressed my arm again, and this operation was repeated for five days, when the wound was healed. The silver cone was removed, and there, sure enough, beneath it was the prettiest dimple in the world! And all I had to pay was ten dollars."

A BALLAD OF MADNESS.

The Story of the Song that Wrought the Death of Margot.

I am, God knows, a kind, extremely sensitive, and honest man. The misfortunes of others, and all human sorrows, awaken my compassionate sympathy, and cause my tears to flow. No mendicant has ever passed me without receiving substantial aid. I have bestowed marriage portions upon orphan girls, established deserving young men in business, founded hospitals, and provided for the aged. I have taught self-denial to the rich, virtue to the fallen; and once, when attacked by ruffians with murderous intent, I persuaded them from their evil designs, and led them to repentance and reformation. Wherever I have encountered suffering, it has been my purpose to mitigate and relieve it—frequently visiting even lazar-houses of sin, carrying resignation to the dying, hope to the despairing, and changing into cries of joy the wild lamentations of their unfortunate inmates.

My pity and beneficence extend even to the animal creation, the death of a little pet dog having once thrown me into such violent hysteria that for a time my life was despaired of. I have never allowed shooting upon my estates, and myself have never hunted; for the idea that I could deliberately take the life of any living thing seemed impossible and abhorrent to me. I watch over the nests of birds built in lofty trees or in the clefts of old walls, and protect the covies of partridges scattered through the grass and grain.

Can I be, then, an unconscionable brute, controlled by blind instinct, a victim of inherent depravity, a madman attracted by blood as by the lips of woman, and one who flies to murder as to love? No, a thousand times no! Have I not already said that I am good and tender-hearted. The mysterious beauties of nature and of art fill my soul with sublimest enjoyment. Philosophy and science, which seek to discover the secrets in the heart of man and the mysteries of the laws of life, are a delight to me. Music and poetry, misty horizons, rosy even-tide, clear star-light nights, and suns setting in the glorious sea, create in me profound enthusiasm, and fill me with ecstatic joy, in which thought, delighted, soars into the universal beauty and harmony of things. I believe in God, in a God who rewards and in a God who punishes, in a God who sheds upon us the sweetness of His everlasting love, in a God who kindles the flames of expiating torment.

Why—why, then, did I commit that horrible crime? Why did I slay, with the refinement of calm ferocity—why, why did I kill a loving and beloved being? For I did indeed love her, sweet victim. Yet killed her; basely murdered her as she lay sleeping at my side; while in her happy dreams, perhaps, my image appeared to her, and she smiled tenderly upon it.

That crime, that abominable and monstrous crime, which I have borne with me for two, slow, interminable years, which, like a corroding ulcer, consumes my heart and wastes my frame—it is of that I am about to tell you. You will shudder to hear of it, you will be so horrified to know it, that—ah! I hope, nay, I pray—you will denounce me, deliver me to justice, send me to the scaffold. For, indeed, you see that I must die. Death alone can free me from my terror, only my life's blood can appease my remorse, and cleanse with its expiating stream my stained and guilty soul.

I loved Margot. She seemed a child, though almost eighteen years of age. I met her upon the highway, one evening, clothed in rags and almost dying of hunger and of want. She was pretty, slight, and delicate, very pale, with large eyes hollowed by suffering. She was an orphan in whom no one took any interest; gentle and weak, she had been cruelly abused by wicked people, so she fled far from her tormentors, stopping at night in villages or at farms, asking for food, alms, sometimes, and sometimes during the day picking up along the road the decaying fruit fallen from the trees. She had been wandering thus for about a week. Whither was she straying? She did not know, being alike ignorant of all lands. The child told me this, weeping bitterly.

I was deeply affected and wept with her. What would become of her, thus alone in the world? Vice and crime run rampant in the country, lurk on the hill-side, crouch in the shadows of the trees, and death is everywhere. Suddenly a sinister flock of ravens wheeled ominously in the cold gray sky above our heads, causing me to shudder with fear, and I thought perhaps the good Lord had sent her there for me to love and protect. I took her with me. Being rich I could afford the luxury of a benevolent action. Two months later I married Margot. In that part of the country where I resided I was considered somewhat queer and eccentric, but this marriage was regarded as an act of pure lunacy, and thereafter my reputation as a maniac was definitely established. Upon seeing me pass, people frequently exclaimed: "That man is crazy." Alas! was it true?

At all events, I was happy. Margot displayed so much tenderness for me—she was the most affectionate, the most devoted, the most submissive of wives. Fearing me as a master, she worshiped me as a god. I attempted to educate her in accordance with her new condition, for, as she had always lived with rustics, she had, of course, their manners, understanding only how to take care of geese and to sing the songs learned while binding the grain with the harvesters, or in the common room of the farmhouse in the winter evenings. But, though her heart was good and her mind pure, night, blackest night reigned in her brain. She could not learn the simplest things, despite her prodigious efforts and her ardent desire to obey and please me. I was compelled to abandon the project of improving her mind, even with the most elementary ideas. And this was a source of disappointment and chagrin to me.

Poor little creature, she understood only one thing, and that was to love me, and she endeavored, by every means in her power, to give some proof of it by her blind submission and dog-like devotion. Then, too, she sang—sang eating, sang dressing, sang walking, sang kissing me. Sad or gay, she sang all day long. What she sang—ah! fatal and accursed song—was an old ballad, tender and pathetic, such as the blind chant in the streets. Her voice then took a mournful and monotonous intonation, swelling the words, dwelling on the syllables. That irritated me beyond everything. Margot's song was destroying my life. It haunted my reading, my reveries, my prayers. It was stamped upon my brain, and filled it with its stupid refrain. It drove from my studious and reflective existence all that heretofore had been my joy and my pride. I could no longer read, no longer write, no longer think. I attempted to flee from its harassing presence. Whole days I traversed the fields, the forest, followed the river's course, humming to silence the abominable strains which pursued me. But neither field, nor forest, nor my voice itself, could deliver me from the accursed air. It was with me everywhere. The fields murmured it: it was in the trill of birds, the rustling of leaves, the wails of the wind; the river bore it on its slow waters. Shepherds leading their flock, cattle lying in the meadows, repeated the awful refrain.

Poor little Margot! She knew nothing of all this torture. I had not told her, lest it should give her pain. And she continued to sing, thinking her voice still sweet to me. However, my patience was at last exhausted, and I requested her to be silent. She was astonished, wept long and bitterly, and promised to sing no more. But the habit was so strong with her, the song had become such a part of her nature, that frequently she would forget herself and break out into singing. At these times I would regard her sternly and she would cease. Her voice was silent, but I perceived by the motion of her lips that she was continuing mentally, in spite of herself, as if impelled by some invisible power, the air begun aloud. At last she sang no more. But her lips were always moving. What had before troubled my ears, disturbed now my eyes. And this fearful thing happened: I no longer heard the song, but I saw it, saw it distinctly, plainly, remorselessly. As formerly all objects sang with Margot's voice, now all things discovered its terrifying phantom.

Six years—ages—six years of this fiendish torment passed away. My health failed visibly, and I feared my reason was giving way. I no longer took pleasure in anything, all things were alike insupportable to me. My studies were abandoned. I became gloomy, and as restless as an imprisoned wild beast, and often had paroxysms of passionate anger or strange hallucinations. Death seemed imminent, and it was a great consolation to think that I should soon be delivered from the incubus which was destroying my life.

One night Margot was sleeping peacefully by my side. How pretty she looked—her small face so delicate and sad, her rosy mouth half opened, her breath coming lightly and regularly, her bare arm folded under her head. I looked at her and gently caressed her long, unbound, black hair streaming over the pillow. The night-lamp shed a rosy light over her. But, hark! Suddenly, in the silence of the room, a sound arose. The song! The song! Yes, it was indeed the song again. I heard it, the accursed thing. It was escaping from the sleeping lips of Margot. The blood rushed to my brain, a shudder shook my frame. I raised my arm as if to strike. In the alcove above my head hung a massive silver crucifix. I nervously seized it. But the song had ceased. Nothing could be heard in the room but the calm breathing of the sleeper. How long did I lean over the poor victim, panting, suffocating, the crucifix uplifted ready to strike? I can not tell. The clock struck hour after hour. "It shall not escape me again," I whispered to myself. And I watched Margot's lips as a handiwatcher for the traveler whom he expects to pass that way. Now her silence irritated me.

Ha! ha! at last. And scarcely has the first sound issued from those sleeping lips, than, brandishing the crucifix with both hands, and arms stretched at full length, I brought it down heavily upon Margot's head. With what a dull thud it struck the quivering flesh. Not a cry, not a moan! A few contractions twist her limbs. Her little hands beat the air, clutch the sheet. She becomes rigid, and moves no more. It is done. The song is silenced forever.

I believed it then. Alas! Margot is dead, the gentle, the innocent Margot. But the song still lives, more pitiless, more tormenting than ever. It has passed from Margot's soul into mine. I sing it now; I sing it always. I can not help singing it. If I travel, it follows me; if I plunge into debauch, it follows me; if I lose myself in the crowd, it follows me. Everywhere I go, there it is also; it is as much a part of me as my flesh and blood. O, pity me! Denounce me! Deliver me to justice! Send me to the scaffold! Death, kind death alone can save me from this demon, this spectre, this vengeance of God—Margot's song.—Translated from the French for the Argonaut by Mrs. M. A. Halsey.

At a recent dinner-party given by the Emperor of Austria some of Count Andrassy's friends were condoling with him upon the recent theft of all his chivalric insignia. The count had just observed that few people could realize how many vexatious troubles were inflicted by such a robbery upon its victim, when the Emperor joined the group that had gathered around the ex-premier, saying: "I can very well imagine how desperate the count must have felt when he was informed of what had taken place. Moreover, I know what was the real cause of his despair. But I shall not reveal it unless I have his promise not to take my disclosure in an evil part." Of course Count Andrassy protested that "he could not but learn with respectful gratitude whatsoever his majesty had been pleased to discover." Whereupon, the Emperor continued: "What really drove the count beside himself when he was apprised of the robbery was his inner consciousness that he did not in the least know what orders, or how many, he was the possessor of, and therefore could not venture to make the declaration required by the police in such cases, specifically describing the property stolen from him." Turning toward Andrassy, his majesty laughingly inquired: "Am I not in the right?" "You are, indeed, sire," replied the Magyar statesman, with a profound bow; "in this case my chief annoyance has resulted from an embarras de richesse."

It is related of First-Lieutenant (afterward Commodore) Thomas W. Wyman that when the Delaware was thrown on her broadside, with difficult climbing he succeeded in reaching her quarter-deck, where, snatching the trumpet from the officer in charge, his first order, given in a voice heard distinctly fore and aft, was: "Keep clear of the paint-work!" This command to hundreds of human beings packed in the lee scuppers like sardines in a box, instantly restored them to order, they naturally feeling that if, at such a time, such an order could be given, the condition was not a serious one.

THE TROTTING-HORSE REPORTER.

He Becomes a Prospective-Bliss Editor, for he has taken a Wife.

For a long time the Argonaut has been reprinting from the Chicago Tribune the clever sketches of the "Trotting-Horse Reporter," and the novelettes of "Joseph Medill, the Tribune novelist." They are the work of H. Teneyck White, who is in reality the "horse reporter," for the sporting columns of the Tribune are under his charge. Inasmuch as he has been wont to humorously attribute his tales of the loves of Gwendolen Mahaffy et al. to Murat Halstead, of the Cincinnati Commercial, the Argonaut has invariably and carefully credited them to Joseph Medill, the imposing chieftain of the Tribune.

The lady who has linked her fortunes with the trotting-horse reporter is Miss Fannie Driscoll, who, although she lives in Milwaukee, writes extremely well. The young lady has published some striking poems, and a great deal of excellent verse. The readers of the Argonaut are familiar with her productions, as many of them have appeared for the first time in our columns. The young lady met Mr. White last year in Chicago, and there is said to be quite a romantic story connected with their match. The wedding took place in Milwaukee, and it is related of the bridegroom that when the party took their stand before the clergyman he remarked—such is the force of habit: "Well, I see the judges are in the stand. The hell had better be rung to score up." This, however, may be the invention of some unlucky rival.

If Miss Fannie loves her husband half as hard as she has loved her pen-drawn heroes, he will be like the fly in amber—he will die like a rose, in aromatic pain. But the probabilities are that Miss Fannie is only intense on paper, and that she will make a loving little wife to her clever husband. They have our best wishes.

Some graceless scribe on the Chicago Herald has perpetrated the following novelette, in which Mr. White's style is imitated and a conjugal tiff foreshadowed:

THE WEDDING OF THE HORSE REPORTER AND GWENDOLYN MAHAFFY.

"My nose itches." These words, lightly spoken, came love-laden from the rose-red lips, parted slightly to show the teeth gleaming like ivory in the beautiful mouth of Gwendolyn Mahaffy as she stood in the centre of the spacious drawing-room of the old baronial house of her father, the eighth Duke of Milwaukee. It was Gwendolyn's marriage day. She had just been married to the horse reporter, and the mansion was ablaze with the youth and beauty of the town. In the center of the room stood the happy couple surrounded by their friends, who showered their congratulations upon them. Gwendolyn looked proudly happy by the side of her husband, as the bright December sun shone through the huge antique window, and broke upon her golden hair in a thousand ripples. Her dress was a marvel of dead white Ottoman silk and rose-point duchesse lace. The court train was finished with a full Russian ruche, tucked on with pendants of cut crystal. The front was cut in battlements that revealed platings of satin encrusted with crystal and tinsel. The tulle was draped with a forty-inch flounce, caught up on the left side with an immense bar of brilliants. The bodice was concealed by a zouave jacket—one mass of glittering crystal. This was fastened over the low corsage with a cluster of diamonds, beneath which was a large, loose bouquet of Baronne de Rothschild roses. Undressed kid gloves encased hands and arms, and fastened to the shoulder with a semi-circle of gems. She wore a demi-veil, which covered her face, and carried on her arm a reticule in the form of a shield wrought in orchids, while her hands were engaged with a fancy filigree smelling-bottle and a fan, a marvel of lace and Ceylon pearls.

One by one the guests paid their respects and departed, last among them being Beryl McMurtry and Aristides Mulcahey, the bridesmaid and best man. At length the bride and groom were left alone; and when he had encircled her waist with his arm, he paused, and asked, in tones choked with emotion:

"Would you do anything I should ask of you, love?"

She did not answer at first, but suddenly nestled herself against his manly breast, and murmured, softly:

"Why, darling, you know I would! What is it?"

After a moment of agonized hesitation, he leaned over her, his face betraying his firm resolve and his lips almost touching her beautiful hair as he bessed into her ear the baleful words:

"Promise me to write no more poetry."

Without raising her head, the beautiful girl slipped, limp and senseless from his arms, and fell on the floor with a dull, sickening thud.

"I have knocked her out in four rounds," he said, and, laughing sardonically, he began rolling a cigarette."

The "Chinnacle's" Hawaiian Hurrrrs.

EDITORS ARGONAUT: In a number of your humorous paper, dated November 4, I read some lines contradicting an article which appeared in the Weekly Chronicle about the 21st of September, headed "Hawaiian Horrors." I, the undersigned, master of the barkentine Emma Augusta, have been sailing regularly between Kahului and Puget Sound for two years. Having read so much in the Chronicle about brutal treatment of plantation hands, it has caused me to investigate the subject, to satisfy my own curiosity. I find the reports to be false, at least on the Island of Maui, where most of the Norwegians are working. The Chronicle asserts, as an example of brutality, that the Norwegians were driven into houses without chimneys or door. The editor of the Chronicle can not know much about the tropical world to think that chimneys are required in dwelling houses. When I am at the Sandwich Islands, I am glad to remove windows and doors, to get air. It is also stated in the Chronicle that trade in women is carried on, and, as an example, it gives two cases: two girls being sold on the Island of Maui. The one was married to an overseer, and, according to the contract, was to return part of the passage money if married before the contract was up; the other was sold by Captain L'Orange to Mr. C. H. Dickey, and he again sold her to the master of a vessel. This is altogether false. This girl, who, as the Chronicle states, I bought of Mr. Dickey, was not bound under contract, and when she changed place from Captain L'Orange to Mr. Dickey, it was by her own wish. During her short stay there she was treated more like a friend than a servant, and when she left Mr. Dickey I offered to return part of the passage-money for my wife.

Now, I will give you the character of the Chronicle's informant, the Reverend Mr. Lange. A Norwegian who worked with him at Mr. Hitchcock's, on Hawaii Island, worked his passage with me to Honolulu Bay. His name is Johan Engelgriset. He states that this reverend gentleman was constantly creating ill-feeling between the planters and the working-class. His countrymen gathered money to release him from his contract and to pay his passage to San Francisco, in order to get him out of the way. He was recklessly squandering his own money. He went as far as Honolulu, but at that place cast to the winds his passage-money, and came to Maui Island to get more from his countrymen. But he appeared in such a drunken condition that they had to complain to the owner of the plantation, who gave him the alternative of leaving the grounds or being arrested. And a few others like him, whom the planters are getting rid of, and their contracts, are the Chronicle's informers. The planters of the Island of Maui are satisfied to remain in their present position to remain there when their contracts are ended.

Master of barkentine
EUREKA, Humboldt Bay, December 15, 1882.

SOCIETY.

The Hopkins Reception.

The reception given by Mrs. Mark Hopkins, at her mansion on California Street, on Thursday evening last, in honor of the late matrimonial alliance of her niece, Miss May Crittenden, and her adopted son, Mr. Timothy Hopkins, was a gorgeous and magnificent affair, and may properly be ranked among the first social events of this or any country—at least so far as great wealth, elegance of costumes, perfection of menu, and splendor of premises can combine to make such an occasion unexceptionable. The invitations for this reception had been out several weeks, which gave all who were upon the hostess's list a splendid opportunity to make their arrangements for display of costume without haste; and long before the arrival of Mrs. Hopkins and her adopted son and his beautiful bride, the house which was to be made a scene of rejoicing was placed in a most perfect state of renovation without and within. So it only lacked the music of Ballenberg, the merry voices of the young, electric illuminations, and other accessories, to transform the imposing pile on the corner of Mason and California streets into a place of perfect enchantment.

The day opened inauspiciously with rain, but toward evening the sky cleared, and a splendid moon came out to throw silvery shadows on the castellated mansion. Preparations had been busily carried on for a week before. For three days previous over a hundred men were busily decorating the interior. A dozen of the most expert florists in the city were hurriedly weaving garlands and flower-streamers from the thousands of gay blossoms that had been culled from all the hot-houses and nurseries of this city and Oakland, besides the rare exotics from the spacious greenhouses that adjoin the residence. The lower halls, and the apartments where refreshment was served, received especial attention as regards floral display. The French chef-de-cuisine had added numerous aids to his already large staff of culinary servants, and the kitchen, in appearance, resembled that of some Louis XIV., or one of the De Medicis, with its extraordinary moldings and mixings of rare conceits in confections, toothsome viands, melting drifts of snowy ices, and frosty sherbets.

The entrance-vestibule was rich in the sombre coloring of its rosewood wainscoting and heavy reds and golds of the upper wall. Above the archway to the huge dancing-hall and picture-gallery, the escutcheon bearing Mrs. Hopkins's heraldic device stood out in bas relief. The hall presented a brilliant spectacle. The dark wood floor was completely hidden by snowy canvas. The pictures, many of which are rare works of art, purchased at untold expense, were the sole adornments of the wall. Between pillars, ornate in capital and architecture, were set rare palms and fern-trees, which sprung from mossy beds, and made long glades and leafy vistas through the spacious alcoves, wherein soft nothings could be gently whispered by youths and maidens weary of the dance and crowded splendor. The soft strains from instruments of string and wind floated down from an upper gallery upon the gay scene below. The huge chandeliers, with their dozens of flashing electric lights shimmering through soft porcelain shades, cast the radiance of fairy-land upon the gorgeous spectacle.

Guests commenced to arrive about a quarter past nine, and a little before ten Ballenberg's full band struck up its first delightful notes, which mingled with the sounds of hundreds of merry voices. Dancing was indulged in by many, although, as at a former party, a majority of the guests preferred the promenade, which took in nearly all of the floor, with its matchless medley of mosaics, medallions, mirrors, panels, and paintings. At half past eleven o'clock the doors of the dining-room were thrown open, and for an hour or two the superbly loaded tables were made the Mecca of many a pilgrim in search of substantial midnight fare. There were no dancing programmes, which, as the Argonaut has stated heretofore, is en regle. The menu was a novel affair, and consisted of a piece of white satin about seven inches long and three wide, placed upon a handsome bevel-edged card, made double or with a hinge, so as to close by means of a satin cord, and then disclose, in the centre of the card, an orange blossom and young leaf in wax. It was an exquisite conceit, and is creditable to the concern that designed it, which was probably an Eastern one. The following is the MENU.

Huitres de l'Est.
Service Chaud.—Consommé de Volaille, Cailles à la Pompadour, Terrapin à la Maryland, Huitres à la Poulette, Huitres Marinade.
Service Froid.—Chaufrond de Bécassines, Aquarium de Langoustes, Aquarium de Samon, Aloyau à la Creole, Terrine de Gibier St. Hubert, Paté de Foies Gras aux Truffes, Arcades de Dinde Mosaïque, Gratin de Langue de Beufs, Galantine de Perdreaux.
Salades.—Mayonnaise de Volaille, Ris de Veau à la Ravigotte, Salade de Crevettes, Salade de Crabes, Salade Russe.
Sandwiches.—Sandwiches de Jambon à la Diable, Sandwiches de Poulet Truffé, Sandwiches de Paté de Foies Gras, Sandwiches de Caviar.
Pices Montées.—Cloche Symbolique aux Cupidons, Deux Pendans de Paul et Virginie, Deux Aquariums Paralleles.
Glaces.—Glace à la Neapolitaine, Glace à la Plombière, Biscuits Ambassadeurs, Caté Glacé.
Pâtisseries.—Bouchées à la Chantilly, Gâteau de Noce, Gâteaux de Soirée, Croquants Assortis, Nougat Parisien, Fruits, Caramels, Marrons Glacés, Bonbons, Mottes, Souvenirs Garnis.
Café à la Crème.

Fourquet—Cadenau, French caterers.

It will be noticed that the names of the artists are affixed to this artistic production, as was the way of Raffaele, Titian, Correggio, and other great men. Who was it that, gazing on Titian's painting, exclaimed "Io anchore son pittore"? So Cadenau, gazing on Fourquet's confectionery marvels, might exclaim: "I, too—I am a cook."

As might have been expected, the toilettes of the ladies were very elaborate and beautiful. Mrs. Mark Hopkins, the hostess, wore a costume of brocaded satin of leaves and flowers, draped with Chantilly lace and passementerie; ornaments, diamond necklace and solitaire diamond ear-drops. Her bride wore her wedding-dress, which was described in the Argonaut the Saturday following the wedding. Among the guests present who are noted for wearing superb and elaborate costumes, we may mention Mrs. Charles McLaughlin, a remarkably beautiful dress made by Worth; Mrs. John McMillin, Mrs. Hutchinson, Mrs. Schmiedell, Mrs. Spaulding, Mrs. Swift, Mrs. Pixley, Mrs. Adam Grant, and Mrs. Foster, in velvet. Without exception, however, the ladies were all elegantly and faultlessly attired, and there was a delightful confusion of satin and silk and brocade, Point and Chantilly and Valenciennes, and diamonds and feathers and flowers. Taking everything into consideration, we doubt if there was ever a prettier party in America.

New Year's Receptions.

The following named ladies will hold receptions on Monday next, January 1, 1883:

Mrs. Henry L. Dodge, assisted by Miss Mollie Dodge, (her niece,) Mrs. W. G. Elliott, Mrs. Major F. A. Whitney, Mrs. Governor-elect Stoneman, Mrs. Charles Sontag, and the Misses Adams, of Menlo Park, at the Palace.

Mrs. Colonel J. D. Stevenson, assisted by her daughters, at 2109 Van Ness Avenue.

Mrs. John McMullin, assisted by her daughters, Mrs. General A. V. Kautz of Angel Island, Mrs. Marshall and Miss Marshall, Mrs. L. S. B. Sawyer, Miss Ada Johnson, Miss Weller, Miss Maud Forbes of San Rafael, Miss Carrie Miller of Stockton, Miss Nellie Trowbridge, Mrs. Charles McLaughlin, and Miss Sullivan, at 1414 California Street.

Mrs. Charles Main will receive at the Palace.

Mrs. Charles F. MacDermott will be at home at the Palace.

Mrs. Drury Melone will be at home, No. 1321 Sutter Street.

Mrs. B. C. Truman will receive, No. 1811 Pierce Street, near California.

Mrs. Colonel R. H. Sinton will be at home, at the Ralston House.

Mrs. F. Berton will receive at the Grand.

Also Mrs. Isadore Burns, Mrs. N. L. Broughton, Mrs. G. E. Dickson, and Mrs. D. H. Jones, at the Grand.

Mrs. Adam Grant, assisted by her niece, Miss Hammond, and Miss Lizzie Sinton, at 1112 Bush Street.

Mrs. J. P. Hale, at the Occidental.

Miss Emma Broughton, assisted by Miss Lilly C. Burnett, at the Grand.

Mrs. Lloyd Tevis, assisted by Miss Lizzie Tevis, Mrs. Colonel Withington, and other ladies, at 1316 Taylor Street.

Mrs. L. E. Pease, at the Grand.

Mrs. D. A. Smith, at the Occidental.

Mrs. J. F. Lewis, at the Grand.

Mrs. H. J. Booth, assisted by Miss Edith Forbes and other ladies, at 501 Harrison Street.

Mrs. S. F. Thorn, at the Grand.

Also Mrs. J. S. Robinson, Mrs. G. H. Southwick, and Mrs. Gauley, at the Grand.

Mrs. P. B. Simons, at the Occidental.

Mrs. Irving M. Scott will be at home, at 507 Harrison Street.

Mrs. Bonyng will receive, assisted by Mrs. J. H. Jewett, at 1315 Mason Street.

Mrs. Neal, assisted by Mrs. A. B. McBride, at the Grand.

Mrs. Mark L. McDonald, at the Occidental.

Mrs. H. N. Cook, assisted by Miss Scoffy, at 809 Hyde Street.

Mrs. Abram Halsey, at the Lick.

Miss Holtz, assisted by Miss Baldwin, at 328 Ellis Street.

Mrs. Doctor J. D. Whitney, at the Lick.

Also Mrs. Dana, at the Lick.

The Misses Lange, assisted by Mrs. Doctor Keefe, will receive at their residence, 1 Bay View, Presidio.

The ladies of Alcatraz, Fort Point, and Black Point will join those of the Presidio, and receive from eleven till five.

Mrs. H. J. Booth will receive on New Year's day, at her residence, on Rincon Hill, assisted by the Misses Booth, Fay, Forbes, Wilson, and Felton, and will have a reception from eight to twelve o'clock in the evening.

Mrs. Tewksbury, assisted by Miss Nannie Crane, of Oakland, at the Palace.

Mrs. L. Henry Newton, assisted by Mrs. Charles Josselyn and the Misses Ruth and Rebecca Holladay, at the Palace.

Mrs. Montague, assisted by Mrs. Doctor McNulty, at 1108 Bush St.

Mrs. Dumelle, assisted by Mrs. Lord, at 438 Second Street.

Mrs. James A. Robinson, assisted by Miss Hawes and Miss Dearborn, at the Palace.

Mrs. Henry Wetherbee, assisted by Mrs. Reed and Mrs. Farnham, at the Palace.

Mrs. Schmiedell, assisted by her daughters and Miss Peters.

Also the following-named ladies: Mrs. H. Miller, Mrs. Findley, Mrs. Joseph Marks, Mrs. Greenbaum.

Mrs. William Lane Booker, assisted by the Misses Page, Miss Atherton, Miss Gray, Miss Lucas, and other ladies, at 606 Stockton Street.

Notes and Gossip.

The Princess Louise and party left Monterey on Saturday last, the 23d instant, and arrived in Los Angeles at eight o'clock Sunday morning; at eleven the same morning the party left for Santa Barbara, via Wilmington and the sea, and are now at the Arlington Hotel, in the former city. Captain and Mrs. R. C. Hooker have arrived in Washington, where they both have multitudes of friends. Mr. and Mrs. S. D. Hovey have been spending a week or two at the Sierra Madre Villa, one of the loveliest places in the world. Mrs. Judge Wheeler has her sister, Miss Clara Rowe, of Marysville, with her as a guest for the winter. Mrs. Lieutenant-Commander Buford and Miss Flora Low leave for New York to-day, as guests of Mr. Charles Crocker, who leaves for the East to-day in his private car, via the Central and Union roads. Mrs. Judge Sanderson and her daughter have arrived in New York, where they were met by Judge Sanderson, and will remain until next Tuesday, when they will all go to Washington. Madame Zeitska and daughter went down to Monterey on Saturday last, to stay over Christmas; also Dr. and Mrs. W. E. Ledyard, W. B. Chapman and Ward McAllister. Mr. Thomas Hill and daughter, Miss E. L. Hill, of Oakland, who have been visiting Monterey, have returned. Since the arrival of her daughter in Washington, Mrs. ex-Senator Stewart has taken up her residence at the Riggs House. Miss Maud Loud, of San Jose, will spend the balance of the winter as the guest of either Mrs. Roman of this city, or Mrs. Captain Forney, of Oakland. Hon. and Mrs. Drury Melone entertained at dinner, on Tuesday evening last, Governor-elect and Mrs. Stoneman, Judge and Mrs. Ross, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph D. Redding, and a number of others. A calico party, similar to that given last winter, will be given by the ladies of the Grand Hotel on Monday evening, the 8th proximo. A number of gentlemen of this city have purchased a fine oil painting of General Stoneman, and presented it to his wife. Mr. and Mrs. Charles Miller are contemplating a European tour. Mrs. George Hearst, who is still in New York, leaves for home next week. Governor-elect Stoneman has gone to Sacramento. Mrs. Stoneman, however, is still at the Palace, where she will remain until the latter part of next week. Mrs. A. G. Kinsey, of the Grand, has gone to Monterey to stay over New Year's. Mrs. Judge Crocker and her daughter, Miss Amy Crocker, went to Sacramento on Tuesday last. Miss Crocker has issued cards for a reception for next Friday, the fifth proximo, at her mother's residence in Sacramento, which promises to be a brilliant affair. Mr. and Mrs. J. G. Kittle have gone to Monterey with their family. Mr. and Mrs. A. N. Towne, who have been at the Windsor Hotel for several weeks, leave for New Orleans shortly after the first of January, and may be expected in San Francisco on or about the fifteenth. Mrs. O. W. Childs, of Los Angeles, has been visiting in this city. Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Ewing have returned from Monterey. O. B. Vermilye, of New York, is at Monterey. Mrs. J. B. Osborne, of the Grand, is at San Rafael. Mrs. Doctor Harvey will spend New Year's at Sacramento. Hon. F. A. Tritle, Governor of Arizona, has been in the city most of the week. Mrs. James H. Burnham has been visiting in Sacramento. Mrs. George H. Kimball, of the Grand, is spending the holidays with her mother and sisters in Los Angeles. Miss Louise Buckminster is visiting friends in Sacramento. Captain and Mrs. R. S. Floyd, who have lately returned from their lovely summer place on Clear Lake, gave a dinner to a number of their friends at their residence on First Street on Monday evening last. Mr. and Mrs. G. Frank Smith's reception, at their residence in Oakland, takes place on Thursday evening next, the fifth proximo. Mr. and Mrs. David Brown, of Buchanan Street, and Captain and Mrs. N. T. Smith, of Octavia and Jackson, leave to-day for Monterey to stay until Tuesday next. Mrs. Homer S. King will celebrate New Year's with her family and her mother's family at the homestead in Napa County. Mr. and Mrs. O. P. Dodge, of Sacramento, who have been visiting in this city, have returned. Mr. and Mrs. Stubbs, who have been in New York for a number of weeks, leave for home on Tuesday next via New Orleans. Mr. and Mrs. Goodman are still at the Buckingham Hotel in New York. Miss Jennie Gallatin gave an elegant party to about two hundred and fifty young people at her father's residence, in Sacramento, on Monday evening last. In this city, on the same evening, Mrs. Doctor Spaulding gave a very delightful party to the guests of the Ralston House. On Tuesday evening last, the 26th instant, Mrs. Jarboe gave an elegant reception at her residence on Pine Street. George Crocker accompanies General Butterfield on a trip to Guatemala to-day. Those who have fully made up their minds to visit Honolulu, and witness the coronation of the king, are Mrs. Adam Grant, Mrs. Judge Crocker and Miss Amy Crocker, Mr. and Mrs. A. H. Rutherford, Consul Severance and Mrs. Severance, Mr. and Mrs. J. Wright, and Mrs. Volney Spaulding. Mrs. Edward Strauss, of Denver, is at present in this city on a visit to her family. Major and Mrs. Worth, of Benicia, are in town at the Occidental.

Wedding.

The following card has been received at this office. Some remarks on the happy couple will be found on page 3:

Henry Ten Eyck White,
Fanny Driscoll,
Married.
Thursday, December seventh,
Eighteen hundred and eighty-two.
Milwaukee, Wis.

At Home
After December fifteenth.
44 Rush Street,
Chicago, Ill.

A Unique Entertainment.

Mr. and Mrs. Irving Scott gave an entertainment at their residence on Friday evening, the 22d instant, which will be long remembered by all who were present, as well for its originality as for the complete pleasure and enjoyment realized. The occasion which prompted the ever-genial Scott and his estimable lady was the revival of the Overland Monthly; and so they quietly arranged to entertain as many as possible of the contributors to both the old and new series; and when we state that such well-known literary ladies and gentlemen as Mrs. S. B. Cooper, Mrs. Jos. A. T. Smith, Mrs. Glasecock, Miss Lake, Miss Shinn, Mrs. Webb, Miss Coolbrith, Miss Sheppard, Miss Bishop, Mrs. Green, Mrs. Field, Judge Boalt, Theodore Hittell, W. C. Bartlett, Dr. Widney, Dr. Jos. Le Conte, Professor Kellogg, A. A. Wheeler, Dr. Benton, Professor Sill, J. H. Carmany, Dr. Barrows, and others, were present, we scarcely need say more as to the interest of the occasion. Suffice it to say, then, that there were forty-four persons present, and that the superior repast was flavored with sparkling conversation and amplified by speeches by Mr. Scott, Mr. Bartlett, Professor Le Conte, Professor Kellogg, W. W. Crane, J. H. Carmany, Judge Boalt, Rev. Mr. Barrows, and others; a poem by Miss Coolbrith, and letters from gentlemen who were unable to attend.

The School of Design.

The annual distribution of prizes of the School of Design took place on Friday, the 22d instant, at the rooms of the Art Association, on Pine Street. Colonel A. G. Hawes, president of the association, occupied the chair. Mr. Martin, the assistant secretary, in his annual report, announced the association to be now free from debt, twenty-five hundred dollars of the arrears having been cleared off since the last annual meeting. The list of members has largely increased, as many as two hundred having been added during the last few months. The average attendance at the school for the past year has been eighty students, showing a larger increase than any preceding year since the foundation of the school, in 1873. Mr. Virgil Williams, the director of the school, made a few remarks on the progress of the school and its relative position to other art-schools in America. The president then proceeded to distribute the medals. The Alford medal was awarded to Miss D. Willis, for the best drawing from the antique. Mr. Charles J. Carlson was awarded the Avery medal, for general excellence in work in oil, embracing figure, portrait, and still-life painting. Miss Janet S. Kirk well deserved the mention of the committee for an excellent piece of still-life painting; also Miss E. M. Reynolds for a similar study. We noticed some good work in oil—a well-handled head by Miss A. B. Chittenden, and several good still-life paintings besides those already mentioned. In black and white, there was some fair work from the cast by Mr. d'Estrella, Miss Smoot, Mrs. Dougherty, and Miss Harris, and some original sketches by Mr. John A. Stanton. The show of work is, on the whole, decidedly above the average of any preceding year. Mr. Rollins, a promising young student, who last year was awarded the Alford medal, has come forward with a number of excellent studies from nature. They are a credit to the school, and we are glad they have met with deserved attention from the art-patrons of this city, as many as fifteen being sold on the first day of the exhibition. The school will reopen on Monday, January 15.

"Have we a Bourbon among us?" was once an interesting if not an important question. Who killed Tecumseh?—who struck William Patterson?—who kicked Tom Pepper out of hell for lying?—who was the Man in the Iron Mask?—who was Kaspar Hauser?—who fired the Ephesian dome?—who built the Pyramids?—in what city was Homer born?—is Lord Bacon the author of Shakespeare? All of these questions justify the man of literary leisure in giving them consideration; but whether General William Tecumseh Sherman has turned Catholic or has not turned Catholic?—whether he has been made a Romanist and attends mass in secret?—whether he aspires to the Republican nomination for the Presidency?—whether he voted at the last Presidential election for Hancock or Garfield?—are questions not worth consideration by any one. Mrs. Sherman has, in this country of religious freedom, a right to turn Papist, or to receive the Golden Rose from the Pope, and Mr. William T. Sherman has a right to indulge his wife in the whim. Mr. and Mrs. Sherman have a right to educate their sons to become priests and their daughters to become nuns, and when this is done Colonel Robert Ingersoll has a right to advocate Sherman for the Presidency; but, all the same, General Sherman will not be nominated, and whether he is on the road to Rome or the White House, he is, in our opinion, nearer becoming a Cardinal than becoming President of the United States of Protestant America.

The first number of the second series of the Overland Monthly is out, and contains a number of attractive papers. President D. C. Gilman writes a good but rather scrappy "Half a Dozen Words from Baltimore to Berkeley"; Miss Shinn and Helen Hunt Jackson contribute striking poems; Mr. T. H. Reardon's admirable paper on "Alfred Tennyson" displays an intimate knowledge of the subject and wide reading; Edward Everett Hale furnishes an article on "Columbus"; Warren Cheney has an excellent review of Bret Harte's complete works; W. E. Griffis dilates on "Corea," a subject upon which he has lately written a book; "Unattended" is a poem by Miss Coolbrith; Evelyn Ludlum and Henry Liddell contribute interesting stories.

GOTHAM THEATRICALS.

"Flaneur" Gives Some of the Stage Gossip of New York.

Lester Wallack is nothing if not spectacular—I mean personally. The rare beauty of his mustache, the intrinsic charm of his smile, the effeminate formation of his hands, and the extreme smallness of his feet are things that go to make Lester Wallack the man. But the superb uniforms, the gorgeous robes, the amazing gowns, and the brilliant morning costumes make Lester Wallack the spectacle. As he grows older, he grows more spectacular and less painstaking in his acting. But still he is the most delightful comedian on the stage to-day, when he chooses to exert himself. It is odd, but the fact is that New Yorkers see less of Lester Wallack than the people of many neighboring cities. For nearly two years he has steadily refused to act in his own theatre, and consequently he has been steadily out of the sight of his patrons. But he has acted often enough during this time around New York, and even on the western circuit. People constantly complain of his absence, and wonder why he has never appeared in his new theatre. Various reasons are given for his absence. The truth is, that when he built his up-town house he incurred great expense, and was obliged to go on the road to lighten his load. While his very expensive company was playing at his new theatre, he could go elsewhere and clear several thousands a week himself. As his new venture has not been an overwhelming success financially—though in itself one of the most beautiful places of amusement in the country—he has had to keep up his policy of playing star engagements. Several times he has appeared at the Windsor, but the theatre is so far down town that New Yorkers of the better class do not visit it. Last night Mr. Wallack began an engagement at the Mount Morris Theatre. This house is more than five miles above New York's amusement centre, and is a new venture.

After dinner last night I took up the paper, and there was the announcement that Lester Wallack would play the time-honored and highly respectable emotional play of "Rosedale," at the Mount Morris Theatre. I hadn't seen him as Elliott Grey for five years, and I decided to brave the terrors of a howling wind from the Arctic zone, and struggle up to the suburban theatre. In a few minutes I boarded the elevated train, rushed into a car, and saw five or six men with collars up about their necks and crush hats on their heads. All were staring at their toes and swearing at the weather. They were regular "first nighters."

"Ulo," I said, "where are you all going?"

"Up to see the Guv'nor. If he won't come to us, we'll go to him."

I sat down and glanced around the car. There were several ladies in full dress, and a dozen or more men who were easily recognizable as habitués of Wallack's Theatre. The rest of the car was filled with working men and women, who gazed curiously at the theatre-goers. After a while we arrived at the theatre. It was jammed, and half the people were from down town. I never before appreciated the hold Lester Wallack had on New Yorkers. Very few actors can induce fashionable people to travel for miles to attend their performances. When the "Guv'nor" came on he was received with great applause. He was positively amazing. His uniform was that of a royal dragoon, with the breast a glittering mass of gold and jeweled orders. If you have seen "Rosedale" you will recall the entrance of Elliott Grey. Two ladies and a child are insulted by a huge ruffian, who throws them into a dreadful fright by finally seizing the child and threatening to lash it to death with a whip. As he holds the whip or stick over the child, just ready to bring it down with savage force, the gate of the garden opens and Elliott Grey enters. There is a short struggle between the two men, and then the handsome young dragoon hits the burly gypsy a clip in the eye that knocks him over backward, and the others go in to breakfast. This was once a thrilling sort of a scene, and Wallack did it very well some years ago. Now, however, it is the most grotesque thing imaginable. Last night everything went well up to the time for Elliott Grey to come to the rescue. The ladies screamed, the baby cried, and the cruel villain swung his stick in the air, ready for the dreadful blow. The excitement in the gallery was intense. Everybody waited for the young officer to bound in and save the child. The gypsy held the club up in the air and also waited. He was a considerate gypsy, and kept the club in the air with rare zeal till his right arm was weary, when he changed it to his left hand, and still looked fierce. The band played furiously meanwhile, and the women leaned forward in their seats. At last the garden gate swung open, and, with martial tread and head in air, the dragoon officer entered. I won't attempt any description of the gorgeousness of his attire. Following him at a distance of three feet was a funky in maroon plush.

"Ladies," said the dragoon, with a placid smile, "good-morning."

Meanwhile the gypsy's arm was still upraised. At this moment it occurred to Wallack that it was time to save the child. He smiled a dreadful smile, strode forward, took the infant away from the ruffian, and passed it to its mother. Then the orchestra became wildly excited, the gypsy snorted revenge, looked villainous, and rolled up his sleeves. Wallack removed his jeweled head-gear and sword, and passed them to the funky in maroon plush. Then he stepped daintily in front of the ruffian, but at a distance of at least six feet. At this instant occurred one of the most remarkable things of recent times. Two more funkies, in blue plush velvet with white silk stockings, stepped out of the woods and stood with outstretched arms behind the villain. The band lost itself in an excess of frantic emotion. The villain made a savage lunge at the elegant dragoon. The elegant dragoon, still at a distance of six feet from the gypsy, let out his left hand. There was a "smack!" and the villain fell lifeless and limp into the hands of the funkies in blue plush velvet and white silk stockings.

"Ladies," said Wallack, with an air of ennui, "let us go to breakfast."

The curtain dropped, but the house roared, and stamped, and applauded, until the hero came forward and bowed again and again. I yelled myself hoarse, and everybody joined the gallery in yelling "Hooray for Sullivan." When the old man sang, it set the house wild again. His voice is as good as it was ten years ago, and it seems impossible that he is sixty-four years old. Once or twice in the play he exerted himself a little and brought out all his old cleverness in acting. He changed his costumes at least eight times during the play.

The theatres in New York are important factors in the social life of the metropolis. Thousands of people who can not get into society, and who live in lodgings and boarding-houses, find their main amusements in visiting the theatres. All the places of amusement in the city have their distinctive clientele, though the floating population goes everywhere. The very best people, of course, go to the opera; and it is probable that the Academy of Music, on a Patti night, holds more members of the most exclusive society than any other house in town. The Academy is also much used for balls. Oddly enough, any sort of a ball can be held there, from the "Charity" and "Old Guard" to the wild French balls and the sprees of political organizations. It has the most perfect acoustic properties; all singers prefer it to other houses. But the new National Opera House, which is now building, will knock the Academy higher than your grandfather's kite. It will be a superb structure, built after the style of the Grand Opera House in Paris. In point of architectural beauty, the next place is the new Casino; it will be opened shortly. The decorations are Moorish, and the appointments lavish. Then comes Wallack's; it is a luxurious house. The walls are velvet, with long panels of water-color paintings on satin. The seats and aisles are very roomy, and the foyer a masterpiece of upholstery. This theatre is frequented by the more aristocratic people. Everybody is in full dress; the ladies are often without bonnets or hats, and theatre parties numerous. Between the acts the gentlemen move about the foyer, and smoke cigarettes, or stroll across the street, making a line of monotonous black hats and white shirt bosoms. A Wallack audience seldom applauds with enthusiasm. A few desultory hand-claps is the most the players get. It is all they have deserved, as they have not done much of late. When the audience is really pleased, however, it will applaud for many minutes. Perhaps the next theatre in importance is Booth's. It is making money for the first time in many years, under the management of John Stetson. It is a big house, and the corridors seem interminable, as they are completely walled in with mirrors. The stairways are very fine. The people who go to Booth's are usually lovers of the drama. There is still a large contingent of the throng of admirers who patronized the house when Edwin Booth opened it. There are three immense galleries, and they are usually filled when anything tragic or melodramatic occupies the boards.

Daly's Theatre is, as it has always been, the most showy of New York theatres, and is patronized by the most striking people, as far as looks are concerned. The plays are usually of the "society" kind, like "Pique," "Divorce," "Passing Regiment," and so on, and they draw many frivolous society people to the theatre. More young people and more brilliant-looking young married women go to Daly's than any other theatre in New York, and as a result the audiences are more brilliant and attractive than elsewhere. In point of fashionable standing, the Standard Theatre follows Daly's. It is much visited by the vast throng of society people who ape the English. Gilbert and Sullivan's works are always produced here, and as the managers, ushers, and actors are all English, the place has acquired a sort of tone that is eminently pleasing to the class of which Freddie Gebhardt is the chief disciple. No one with any pretension to fashion would visit the Standard unless he wore an evening dress and a cut-throat English collar. After the Standard comes the Fifth Avenue Theatre. It has not a pronounced policy, as it plays combinations constantly, and hence it has no distinctive class of patrons. The French opera troupes always play at the Fifth Avenue Theatre when in New York, and it is probably this that has given the house some standing among the foreign population of the city. It is certain that there are many gay, black-eyed, and vivacious French women in the audiences. The Union Square Theatre is of much more importance than the last four or five theatres. It ranks ahead of Wallack's dramatically, as it presents brilliant plays, and has, or had before Charley Thorne left, the best stock company in America. More cultured and intelligent audiences go to the Union Square than any other theatre in town, though the very fashionable people are missing. A fashionable audience is much more brilliant as a spectacle than a cultured and clever audience. The Madison Square Theatre has a patronage all its own. Its owners are both ex-clergymen, and their policy of presenting plays absolutely pure and clean, with high class Christian morals, has attracted an immense number of people who never went to the theatre before, and never go to any other theatre than the Madison Square. The emotions of a Madison Square audience are easily worked upon, and they weep with the heroine and laugh with the comedian with a freshness and enjoyment that habitual theatre-goers do not know. The toilettes at the Madison Square are usually quiet and sombre in tone.

The Grand Opera House is the big theatre that Colonel Jim Fiske built just before he was murdered by Stokes. It is a superb house. The main corridor is as large as many first-class theatres. It is run by Abbey and runs combinations. The people who go there are of the "great middle class"—by the way, I don't believe in talking about classes, as they do not exist in America, but how the deuce are you to describe the social status of audiences by any other word? After the Grand Opera House comes Harrigan & Hart's Theatre Comique. This house has the most pronounced and distinctive patrons in the city. They are well-to-do tradespeople and jolly artisans in comfortable circumstances. They go to the theatre to have a good time, and generally they have it. The managers have made a vast fortune, and have spent it in making their house one of the most attractive in a city noted for its beautiful theatres. Niblo's Garden is a big theatre, patronized largely by bald-headed men. The Kralfys produce their spectacular pieces there. Haverly's Fourteenth Street Theatre has not a specially distinctive audience. It plays combinations. Tony Pastor leads the variety business at his pretty little theatre in Fourteenth Street, where clerks, salesmen, "salesladies," and people of every other calling, go because the show is always funny. The Windsor Theatre is in the great East Side, and very far down town in the Bowery—among the tenement houses.

FLANEUR.

NEW YORK, December 20, 1882.

THE TEAL SHOOTING CLUB.

"Are you fond of duck-shooting?" asked a friend, the other day.

"I am, under certain and favorable conditions. I am not, under other and unfavorable conditions," was my reply. "To rig one's self in hunting costume—flannel shirt, corduroy trousers, cotton overalls and jacket, and india-rubber long boots—stop at an awful country tavern, get up in the dark of a dreadful morning, walk miles away to a dismal marsh, plunge into it waist deep, trudge all day in wet and hunger, to come in at night weary, starved, drenched, profane, covered with tude mud, and in one's bag two sprig-tails and a pair of mud-hens—no, I do not like it. I do not relish the return in soiled garments by rail and the Oakland ferry, compelled to lie about my game till I reach Washington Market, and fill up with canvas-backs at a dollar a piece; compelled to send canvas-backs to those I have promised, and send sprig-tails and widgeon, broad-bills and gray-backs, to those who do not know the difference. This sort of thing is no longer amusing. It has lost its romance. I am just turned of the age when the lies I am permitted to tell justify the hardships I am compelled to endure. I like a snipe-hunt, when the indulgence of a generous companion permits me to sit on the fence and see him shoot, and upon coming in at night to claim half the glory and receive half the birds, and upon returning home be permitted to narrate an uncontradicted account of my own exploits."

This sort of hunting is very comfortable and satisfactory; but the swell thing to accomplish is to become the guest of the Teal Shooting Club; location, the Suisun marsh, beyond Benicia. To become a member of the Teal Shooting Club is to attain the apotheosis of duck-hunting; to become a guest of the Teal Shooting Club is to be temporarily apotheosized into the heaven of perfect duck-shooting. You get upon the overland train at half past three; you hand the baggage-master your gun-case, and you hand him half a dollar; you take a seat in a silver palace car, presenting the colored gentleman half a dollar. The railroad company, as a favor conceded to the Teal Shooting Club, has given them a station, stops its trains for their accommodation, and provides them with fresh water. You step from the train to the elegantly appointed gondola of the Teals, and are rowed by moonlight to its village of barges; one equipped with kitchen, store-closet, and dining-room, hung with chromes by the old masters; another divided into eight private bed-rooms, with wash-stands, water-closets, easy beds, lockers, clothes-pegs, and gun-racks. Another barge is fitted for servants, and has a guest room of ample dimensions. James, the cook, is an artist. The dinner is sumptuous, the breakfast is appetizing, the lunch is a poem. The guest is provided with all equipments, from flannel overshirt to gum boots—everything but gun and cartridges. Summoned at early dawn to early coffee, given a servant and row-boat, in comfortable overcoat, on cushioned seat, gun in hand, you are rowed to the "pond." From the slough to the pond canals are cut, through which the boats are pulled. You are placed in the "blind" on cushioned seat, the decoys are placed, and your servant hides in the tule, and waits during the day to pick up your birds. At noon James sends you a pair of dinner pails, one containing a hot meal: the other, dessert; a bottle of Roederer and a couple of cigars accompany it.

The Teal Shooting Club is the best appointed duck club in America, and the Suisun marsh the best duck preserve of which I have any knowledge. It comprises four thousand acres, upon which this club has expended something more than ten thousand dollars to put it in comfortable condition.

At night of the first day I had twenty birds, six of which were canvas-backs and five white geese, which I had shot in utter defiance of the society for punishing cruelty to animals, simply for the fun of seeing them fall from their dizzy height. The second day I bagged thirty-seven ducks and three geese. From my pond I was rowed home to a sumptuous dinner—on this occasion a canvas-hack roast, with accompaniments.

The members of the Teal Club are: G. Frank Smith, President; W. W. Traylor, W. F. Whittier, W. P. Fuller, R. S. Floyd, John Taylor, A. C. Titcomb, and William Hopkins.

The score for the season is as follows: Traylor, 516; Smith, 431; Whittier, 387; Fuller, 294; Taylor, 182; Titcomb, 110; Floyd, 13; Hopkins, absent; guests, 571. Total for the season, 2,484.

There is only one thing in the duck-shooting world more desirable than to be a member of the Teal Shooting Club, and that is to become its guest. When one has been invited to shoot over its preserves, there is only one thing more to be desired, and that is to be invited again. It is with this end in view that I give the club this most excellent notice, and declare my irreconcilable hostility to poaching pot-fillers who encroach upon the hired preserves of hunting gentlemen.

P.

In the United States Senate, yesterday, while discussing the Civil Service Reform bill, Butler, of South Carolina, asked Hoar if he thought Congress had the right to prohibit giving money by employees of the Government for political purposes. Hoar said: "Yes, for corrupt political purposes." Butler asked him how employees could know it was for such purposes. Hoar replied: "To buy shotguns to shoot negroes would be for such purposes." Said Butler: "Or to buy votes and disfranchise 135,000 people, as it is said they have done in Massachusetts." "What does the Senator mean by that?" asked Hoar. "I mean," replied Butler, "that it is stated they have disfranchised 135,000 voters in Massachusetts. I propounded a polite inquiry to the Senator, and when he injects into his reply a piece of venom, I propose to answer him in the same manner. He undertook to thrust at me a very unworthy suggestion; and whenever he proposes to discuss this shotgun policy with me, I am prepared to meet him."

We admit to a very strong prejudice against Mr. Senator Hoar, of Massachusetts. We do not like the man or the senator. We do not like his manner or his name. We print the above to illustrate that our prejudice against this senator is well founded, and as a whereas to the declaration that we hope Governor Butler will drive him out of public life. Senator Hoar has learning enough for a schoolmaster and piety enough for an orthodox local preacher; but when spread over the entire country as successor to Daniel Webster, Charles Sumner, and the other distinguished senators from Massachusetts, he becomes transparently too thin.

FLOTSAM AND JETSAM.

When you take calomel don't eat fish. The large quantity of salt (chloride of sodium) on the fish, combining chemically with the calomel (chloride of mercury) forms bi-chloride of mercury (corrosive sublimate). When you take calomel avoid salt and salt food as you would the most deadly poison. When sick people eat salty food they are apt to drink water freely, and if salivated they lay the blame on the water.

A priest named Luigi Galimberti, residing at Milan, Italy, is said to have discovered the means of photography in natural colors, and the process for enlarging such photographic productions to life size. Another process, said to have been invented by him, gives what he calls phosphorescent pictures, visible at night. The priest is so hampered by poverty that his experiments thus far have been made at the expense and for the benefit of a few personal friends.

In the old times, when people traveled by diligence in France, one traveler was killed in every three hundred and thirty-five thousand, and one wounded in every thirty thousand. Now, when they travel by rail, one is killed per five millions, one hundred and seventy-eight thousand four hundred and ninety, and one wounded per five hundred and eighty thousand four hundred and fifty. Railway traveling is thus nearly twenty times as safe as traveling by diligence.

A Philadelphia jury was called upon to decide, in a customs case, whether a jew's-harp is a toy or a musical instrument. The question put to the expert witnesses was, "Is the jew's-harp capable of producing a succession of harmonious sounds?" One witness played to the jury, "The heart bowed down," and "The Skids are out to-day," and the reporter says that the jury seemed restless and depressed. Their verdict was that the jew's-harp is a musical instrument.

Years ago an old gentleman, walking on the pier at Dover, England, dropped his gold-headed cane through one of the holes locally known as tree-nail holes, in the plank. Indignant and disgusted at his loss, he bequeathed a sum of money to pay for annually stopping these holes, the overplus to be laid out in a dinner to the corporation. An annual dinner consequently takes place, and before the party breaks up they certify that the holes have been duly attended to.

The fossils recently discovered at Charing Cross, in the heart of London, when the deep excavations were made for Messrs. Drummond's banking-house, include bones of the cave lion, tusks and bones of the mammoth, tusks and bones of extinct elephants, remains of extinct Irish deer, remains of red deer, remains of a species allied to the fallow deer, remains of rhinoceros, remains of extinct oxen from the pleistocene gravels, bones of the horse, the sheep, and the short-horn from recent deposits.

Land-hunger has led an English company to make the extraordinary offer of carrying away the waters of Lake Lemán, provided they can have the land thus laid dry. They not only ask for no subsidy, but are willing to pay five million francs for the privilege of doing the work. Their plan is to construct from its lowest depths a tunnel-like canal to a point some twenty miles distant, where the water of the lake can be made to run into the river Rhone. The bed of the Rhone is there about two hundred and fifty feet below the level of the lake.

In the time of James I. so little regard was had to cleanliness that the "dunghill" within the castle precincts "had increased to such a size and bigness that it was ninety-eight yards in length, the depth of it was ten yards, and the breadth of it thirty-two yards," some twenty-seven thousand tons of filth having thus been allowed to accumulate. In the seventeenth century the Great Plague was one of eleven epidemics; it alone caused seven thousand deaths, and it led, by the almost complete desertion of London town, to a ruined trade and wasted treasury.

At Warsteinstein, near Cassellin, Germany, is a library which is said to contain a curious collection of books. At the first glance one would take these books to be mere logs of wood; but investigation shows that each volume is really a complete history of the tree it represents. The back is the bark, in which a small place is cut to write the scientific and common names as a title. One side shows the tree trunk in its natural state and the other is varnished or polished. Inside are shown the leaves, fruit, fibre, and the insect and other parasites which prey upon it, and a full description of its products, etc., is added.

"We stopped suddenly," said Doctor Raines, to an Atlanta Constitution reporter, recently, "when the two trains met on the track just this side of Rome, yesterday. For my part, I went feet foremost under the seat that was just in front of where I was sitting. The most singular thing that I witnessed was done just across the aisle from me. There were two men sitting one directly behind the other, and in front of them was an unoccupied seat. When the engines struck, the man in front turned a complete somersault, and lit in the vacant seat just exactly as he sat in the other seat. The other man performed exactly the same, and lit in the seat lately occupied by his neighbor."

Medical men have always differed as to whether the best medical treatment of frozen persons was by a gradual or a rapid application of heat. "To settle the matter," says Knowledge, "Lapchinski has made a series of very careful experiments upon dogs, with the following results: Of twenty animals treated by the method of gradual resuscitation in a cold room, fourteen perished; of twenty placed at once in a warm apartment, eight died; while of twenty immediately put into a hot bath, all recovered." These experiments will probably influence the practice of medical men in Russia and northern Europe, where the question of the best means of restoring animation in persons suffering from excessive cold is of frequent occurrence every winter.

The following list of the aborigines of North America is as complete as any that is at present available: Apaches, Arrapahoes, Aricares, Blackfeet, Bloods, Brules, Camanches, Cayugas, Senecas, Cherokees, Cheyennes, Chickasaws, Chippewas, Ottawas, Pottawatomies, Choctaws, Muncies, Creeks, Crows, Delawares, Gros Ventres, Iowas, Kaws, Kaskaskies, Weas Peories, Weas Miamies, Pian Keshaws, Kickapoos, Kiawias, Mandans, Menomonees, Niamias, Missouris, Ottos, Minnecongoux, Mubachue, Utahs, Navajos, Moquis, Omabas, Onondagas, Oneidas, Stockbridge, Oregon tribes, Ojegas, Pawnees, Primos, Mesaleros, Poncas, Pueblos, Quapaws, Sacs, Foxes, Sans Arcs, Seminoles, Shawnees, Sioux, Tuscaroras, Two Kettles, Uncopapas, Winnebagoes, Wyandots, and Yantonnais.

A correspondence with hair was once attempted between a notorious French thief, in durance vile, and his comrades outside. A letter was sent to the prisoner from his sweetheart, containing merely a lock of hair wrapped in the leaf of a book. The jailor did not consider the souvenir important enough to be delivered; but in a few days there came a similar enclosure, and yet another. This aroused suspicion, and the governor took the matter in hand. He examined the leaf of the book—it was that of a common novel, twenty-six lines on a page. Then he studied the hair, and noticed the small quantity of the gift. Counting the hairs, he found them of unequal length, and twenty-six in number, the same as the lines on a page. Struck with the coincidence, he laid the hairs along the lines of the page, which they respectively reached, beginning at the top with the shortest hair. After some trouble he found that the end of each hair pointed to a different letter, and that these letters combined formed a slang sentence, which informed the prisoner that his friends were on the watch, and that the next time he was to be examined an attempt would be made to rescue him. The jailor laid his plans accordingly. The attempt was made, but he fell into their own trap.

THE CRUISE OF THE "ROVER."

"Across the Western Seas"

They sailed away one morning when sowing-time was over,
In long red fields above the sea they left the sleeping wheat;
Twice twenty men of Devonshire who manned their ship, the Rover,
Below the little hazy town where all the schooners meet.

Their sweethearts came and waved to them, and filled with noise of laughter
The echoing port below the cliff where thirty craft can ride;
Each lad cried out, "Farewell to thee!" the captain shouted after,
"By God's help we'll be back again before the harvest-tide."

They turned the Start and slipped along with speedy wind and weather;
Passed white Terceira's battlements, and, close upon the line,
Ran down a little carrack full of cloth, and silk, and leather,
And golden Popish images and good Madeira wine.

The crew with tears and curses went tacking back to Florés;
The English ferry cut the seas where none before had been,
And spent the sultry purple nights in English songs, and stories
Of England, and her soldiers, and her Spaniard-hating queen.

At last the trade-wind caught them, the pale sharks reeled before them,
The little Rover shot ahead across the western seas;
All night the larger compass of a tropic sky passed o'er them,
Till they won the Mexican waters through a strait of banyan-trees.

And there good luck befell them, for divers times they sighted
The sails of Spanish merchantmen bound homeward with their wares;
And twice they failed to follow them, and once they stopped benighted;

But thrice the flag of truce flew out, and the scented prize was theirs.

But midsummer was on them, with close-reefed gales and thunder,
Their heavy vessel wallowed beneath her weight of gold;
A long highway of ocean kept them and home asunder,
So back they turned toward England with a richly laden hold.

But just outside Tampico a man-of-war was riding,
And all the mad young English blood in forty brains awoke.
The Rover chased the monster, and swiftly shoreward gliding,
Dipped down beneath the cannonade that o'er her bulwarks broke.

Three several days they fought her, and pressed her till she grounded
On the sandy isle of Carmen, where milky palm-trees grow;
Whereat she waved an ensign, a peaceful trumpet sounded,
And all the Spaniards cried for truce, surrendering in a row.

Alas! the wiles and jesuitries of scoundrel-hearted Spaniards,
The Scarlet Woman dyes their bands in deeper red than hers.
For every scrap of white that decked their tackling and their lanyards
Just proved them self, like devils, and cowardly, like curs.

For out from countless coverts, from low, palm-shaded islands,
That fledged in seeming innocence the smooth and shining main,
The pinnaces came gliding and hemmed them round in silence,
All manned with Indian bravos and whiskered dogs of Spain.

The captain darted forward, his fair hair streamed behind him,
He shouted, in his cheery voice: "For home and for the queen!"
Three times he waved his gallant sword, but the flashes seemed to blind him,

And a hard look came across his mouth where late a smile had been.

We leveled with our muskets, and the foremost boat went under,
The ship's boy seized a trumpet and blew a merry blast;
The Spaniards laid off a while, and gazed at us in wonder,
But the hindmost pushed the foremost on, and boarded us at last.

They climbed the larboard quarter with their hatchets and their sabres;
The Devon lads shot fast and hard, and sank their second boat,
But the Popish hordes were legion, and Hercules his labors
Are light beside the task to keep a riddled barque afloat.

And twenty men bad fallen, and the Rover's deck was reeling,
And the brave young captain died in shouting loud, "Elizabeth!"
The Spaniards dragged the rest away just while the ship was heeling,
Lest she should sink and rob them of her sailors' tortured breath.

For they destined them to perish in a slow and cruel slaughter,
A feast for monks and Jesuits too exquisite to lose;
So they caught the English sailors as they leaped into the water,
And a troop of horse as convoy brought them north to Vera Cruz.

They led them up a sparkling beach of burning sand and coral,
They dragged the brave young Englishmen like hounds within a leash;
They passed beneath an open wood of leaves that smelt of laurel,
Bound close together, each to each, with cords that cut the flesh.

And miles and miles along the coast they tramped beneath no cover,
Till in their mouths each rattling tongue was like a hard, dry seed,
And ere they came to Vera Cruz, when that long day was over,
The coral cut their shoes to rags, and made them wince and bleed.

Then as they clambered up the town the jeering crowd grew thicker,
And laughed to see their swollen feet and figures marred and bent,
And women with their hair unloosed stood underneath the flicker
Of torch and swinging lantern, and cursed them as they went.

And three men died of weariness before they reached the prison,
And one fell shrieking with the pain of a ponard in the back,
And when dawn broke in the morning three other souls had risen
To bear the dear Lord witness of the hellish Spaniard pack.

But the monks girt up their garments, the friars bound their sandals,
They hurried to the market-place with faggots of dry wood,
And the acolytes came singing, with their incense and their candles,
To offer to their images a sacrifice of blood.

But they sent the leech to tend them, with his pouch and his long vial,
And the Jesuits came smiling, with honeyed words at first,
For they dared not burn the heretics without some show of trial,
And the English lads were dying of poisoned air and thirst.

So they gave them draughts of water from a great cold earthen firkin,
And brought them to the court-yard where the tall hidalgo sat,
And he looked a gallant fellow in his boots and his rough jerkin,
With the jewels on his fingers, and the feather in his hat.

And he spoke out like a soldier, for he said, "Ye caught them fighting;
They met you with the musket, by the musket they shall fall;
They are Christians in some fashion, and the piteous bent on lighting Shall blaze with none but Indians, or it shall not blaze at all."

So they led them to a clearing in the wood outside the city,
Struck off the gyves that bound them, and freed each crippled hand,
And dark-eyed women clustered round and murmured in their pity,
But won no glance nor answer from the steadfast English band.

For their lives rose up before them in crystalline completeness,
And they lost the flashing soldiery, the sable horde of Rome,
And the great magnolias round them, with wave on wave of sweetness,
Seemed just the fresh profusion and hawthorn lanes of home.

They thought about the harvests, and wondered who would reap them;
They thought about the little port where thirty craft can ride;
They thought about their sweethearts, and prayed the Lord to keep them;
They kissed each other silently, and hand in hand they died.

—Edmund W. Gosse in Magazine of Art for January.

LITERARY NOTES.

"Quintus Cladius" is a romance of imperial Rome, translated from the German of Ernest Eckstein by Clara Bell. The author displays a wide knowledge of antiquity, and while the tale possesses great interest, it is admirably correct in its details and descriptions of the first century of the Christian era. Published by W. S. Gottsberger & Co., New York; for sale by Bancroft; price, $1.

"A Breeze from the Woods," a volume of sketches and essays descriptive of California scenery, is by W. C. Bartlett, and is dedicated to Mr. A. K. P. Harmon, of Oakland. The author has for many years been one of the editors of the San Francisco Bulletin. The present volume is made up of papers which originally appeared in the Oregonian and Californian. Published by the California Publishing Company.

"A New Method of Learning the French Language" is written by F. Berger, the French Consul-General at New York. It contains many novelties and innovations, but its methods have received high commendation from learned Frenchmen, and it is based upon the admirable plan that it is better to learn a language first and its grammar afterward. Published by D. Appleton & Co., New York; for sale by Doxey & Co., 23 Dupont Street.

In the loss of Annie Keary, last year, the literary world of England and America sustained a severe loss. Her stories, and especially "Castle Daly," contained an extraordinary power in pathetic and dramatic qualities. "A Doubting Heart" was unfinished at her death, but her friend, Mrs. McQuoid, supplied the slight deficiency, and it now appears in book form. It is fully up to the author's past efforts. Published by MacMillan & Co., London and New York; for sale by Bancroft; price, $1.

Mr. Clark Russell, in answer to Mr. Sampson Low's letter concerning the Harpers, has nothing better to advance than a reiteration of his statement that he has never received a penny from America on account of his books. Then he proceeds to narrate an incident in which the traditional Yankee of the British novelist appears. "I was speaking about this," he says, "to an American judge a few nights ago, and he advised me to abandon Great Britain as my native land and become an American citizen. 'There's no other chance,' said he, whittling a lucifer match, and then picking his teeth with it; 'I suppose there is no other chance.' The toothpick judge adds a peculiar liveliness and grace to Mr. Russell's complaint.

For many years "The Household Book of Poetry," compiled by Charles A. Dana, was the only volume of its kind. During the past decade, however, other similar publications have appeared, making a new edition needful, which should keep pace with the times. The author, realizing this fact, has just revised and added to this work, and it now appears in a handsome dress, with more agreeable print and arrangement, and with two hundred additional poems, although some of the old ones have been omitted. By the way, we notice one of Ina D. Coolbrith's poems, "When the grass shall cover me," is credited to "Anon." Published by D. Appleton & Co., New York; for sale by Doxey & Co., 23 Dupont Street.

Simon Sterne, a well-known member of the New York bar, has just written upon the "Constitutional History and Political Development of the United States." The author has sought to make a volume which should be not only what is termed a "popular" history, but also an interpretation of our National Constitution, and a history of the political controversies which have arisen over its clauses, which resulted in a change of its text, or which may at some future time, according to the exigencies of parties. The author has many very sensible and original ideas concerning our needs and interests, but the fallacy of his arguments against protection is evident by a reference to our history. Published by Cassell, Petter, Galpin & Co., New York; for sale by Bancroft; price, $1.25.

Edmondo de Amicis is a fascinating raconteur, and his volumes of travel, while they are not equal to those of Théophile Gautier in descriptive writing, have a charm and originality of their own which are not possessed by any other similar works. The author has now tried his hand at short story-writing. We caught a glimpse of his powers in this line here and there in his "Spain" and "Morocco," but the present volume, "Military Life in Italy," consists of bright sketches and stories which have been written from time to time during a long experience. It is agreeably translated into English by Wilhelmina W. Cady. Among the most interesting chapters are "Carmela" and "That Day." Published by G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York; for sale by Bancroft; price, $2.

"Certainly," says the Boston Transcript, "if Thackeray and Hawthorne and George Eliot had so eschewed all moving incident and dire catastrophe, mere manners, and speech, and posturings, and playings of their people with passions they could neither feel nor inspire, could not chain our attentions as they do to-day. If one-half of human nature and the highest half of human life are to be eliminated in America, then Mr. James's school may be the school of the future. But actual conditions give no such hope. To few people is life the sugar-coated pie about the selection of whose plums they can spend their time prying and conning, as do Mr. James's people. Though faith may be departing, tumultuous human nature still lives, and animal instinct flourishes. Not even Mr. James's superstructure can disguise this. The animal of the past disports within his pines, but without the faith in himself or any one else to raise his emotions into the heroism of a grand passion. The difference is that between health and surfeited conventionality. We do not deny the truth of the picture. We only object to treating him so seriously as to select him as the only specimen of the present day worth embalming. When Hawthorne led us into the confidence of a self-tortured soul we believed with awesome faith, the more so that the experience differed from our own; but there is something about the sufferings of Mr. James's people which prompts the wish to administer a sound thrashing and give them something to do."

We have received from Mr. J. A. Russell, Clerk of the Board of Supervisors, the "Municipal Reports" of San Francisco for 1881-2. The Christmas number of the Caterer contains a number of interesting gastronomic papers. Published by E. C. Whitton, Philadelphia; price, $2 per year. The holiday numbers of the Pansy and Babyland are out. They are remarkable for the beauty of their illustrations. Published by D. Lothrop & Co., Boston; Joseph H. Dorrey, agent for this coast. "Les Récréations Philologiques" for December is just out. It contains a French translation of and notes on "The Lady of Lyons," and reviews (in French) Emerson's "Eloquence." One of the most attractive papers is that on Béranger, in which much of the poet's best verse is discussed. Published by L. Sauveur, 83 Rue Main Street, St. Albans, Vermont; price, $2 per annum. "The Magazine of Art" for January, 1883, is just out, and is rich in illustrations and literary merit. This publication makes no special pretensions, but at the same time secures admirable engravings and articles from the best writers and artists. In the present number there may be principally noted "The Cruise of the Rover," by Edmund Gosse, accompanied by four engravings; "A Pre-Raphaelite Collection," by Cosmo Monkhouse, with six engravings, and "Hogarth's House and Tomb," by Austin Dobson, which also possesses several illustrations. Published by Cassell, Petter, Galpin & Co., London and New York; price, $3.50 per annum. "The North American Review" for January, 1883, contains a number of good articles. "The Revision of Creeds" is by three clergymen, Doctor Marian Smith, Doctor Lyman Abbott, and Doctor H. W. Beecher. "American English" is an attractive paper by G. M. Tucker. "Bigotry in the Medical Profession," by Doctor David Hunt, discusses the regularities and irregularities of doctors. "The Adulteration of Intelligence" by C. T. Congdon, continues a subject already discussed in this magazine.

SANDIE MACPHERSON.

A Vignette in Prose, by Robert Buchanan.

[It will be very evident to the reader that the hero of this sketch is the late Thomas Carlyle.]

It was my privilege, during the last days of his strangely prosperous career, to see a good deal of the late Mr. Thomas Erskine—“True Thomas,” as he was affectionately called by the generation to whom he told so many grim truths. I had gone to him as a literary aspirant—one of the many who, coming up from Scotland to fight for fortune, carried letters of introduction to the great man. The nation delighted to honor him, and despite his dislike of the literary class generally, he never failed to say a kind word to any young brother Scot who sought his advice. For some reason or other he took to me, and, though so many years his junior, I became a frequent visitor at his house, and received a great deal of his confidence. It was one winter evening, as we sat alone together in his study—that study which was a very Mecca to literary pilgrims of all nations—that he made the singular confession which I am about to place on record.

There he sat, aged, honored, famous, the leading man of letters, perhaps, of his generation; an old dressing-gown wrapped around him, slippers on his feet, his face grim as granite (just as it appears in Woodman's bust), and his eyes with that sad prophetic gaze which is reproduced in all the photographs. On the book-shelves close round him were well-thumbed volumes, nearly all of them presentation copies, with the autographs of their mighty authors; chief among them a set of Goethe, with notes in the poet's own handwriting. On the wall, over the mantelpiece, was a scroll in vellum, given to Erskine by the savants of Germany on the occasion of his sixtieth birthday, and his reception of the Grand Cross of the Legion of Sauerkraut, from the hands of the King of Thuringia. In the desk at his elbow was a precious correspondence, signed by such names as Heine, Thiers, Balzac, Hartmann, Darwin, Macaulay, Coleridge, Dickens. Only the day before Erskine had been sent for by the Queen of England, as one of the two or three great men it behooved her to know and honor; and, having spent several hours of conversation with her, he had pronounced her a “nice, homely body, just like a score of farmers' wives he had met in Allandale.” Certainly, he was one to whom the world did homage—kings might have envied his authoritative position. It was, therefore, with some surprise that I discovered, listening to his confession, that the great man was not altogether contented with his success; that it had one serious qualification, which had (as he himself expressed it) cost him many a sleepless night. Thus he spoke:

“You think me a successful man, and such, I allow, is the popular opinion. Well, maybe I have been successful beyond my merits, which are small enough. Lord knows; but lest I should grow daft with my own self-conceit, the Lord sent Sandie Macpherson to keep me humble!

“It is a humiliating confession to make, but almost at any point of my long career, from the very beginning, the thought of having converted Sandie would have been more precious to me than the admiration of all the rest of the world. Sandie, however, never believed in me from the first. When I published my first book, my chief thought was, ‘What will Sandie Macpherson think of this?’ and when I heard the criticisms, which cut me up like a haggis right and left, I could have borne everything but the thought of how he would gloat over them, down yonder in Scotland. I was somewhat consoled and a wee bit hopeful, when, some years afterward, I published my ‘History of the Renaissance in Thuringia,’ for the critics, knowing nothing of the subject, praised it to a man, and talked nonsense about my industry, my originality, and my erudition. I cared nothing for the critics, but I said to myself, with a smile, ‘That's one for Sandie Macpherson, at last!’

“Perhaps you will be asking who Sandie Macpherson is, that I set such store by his good opinion? Well, up till a few months ago you might have seen his name—‘Alexander Macpherson,’ as it was given baptismally—over the door of a small grocer's store in the Gallowgate of Glasgow.

“Sandie and I were schoolfellows.

“We first met in the Rev. Mr. Macindow's seminary, out beyond the Cowcaddens, and afterward we attended Mr. Parallel's Mathematical and Doctor Skelpum's Latin classes, in the high school. As I mind Sandie now, he was a wee, smug-mouthed, black-a-veezed laddie, with eyes like a hawk, and a stoop in the shoulders. From first to last he was ever at the top of the class. He carried away all the prizes at the Rev. Mr. Macindow's, and when he came to the high school, among lads twice his size, he was ‘dux’ of the class. Such a memory as he had! It was wonderful, wonderful. He could repeat the whole Latin Delectus with his eyes shut, and he knew the whole of Euclid, when we were laboring over the ‘Pons Asinorum.’ Doctor Skelpum himself was afraid of him. As for me, where he was dux I was dunce. I had the ‘taws’ nearly every day from the doctor, and ever and aye, while I writhed in my corner. I could hear the cry: ‘Alexander Macpherson, tell Tammas Erskine how to construe’ this or that passage in the ‘Metamorphoses.’ Sometimes, just to shame us, he was put at the very bottom of the class, and then—Lord, to see him louping from place to place, like one running up a brae, and then standing, flushed and triumphant, in his old place, at the very top!

“Sandie's father was a small tradesman in Glasgow, and you may be sure he was proud enough of his son. Sandie was ever spick and span, had the best of clothes, and a silver watch and chain given to him by his aunt on his birthday. His books were like himself—clean, white, and neat, with no thumb-marks nor dog's-leaves to disfigure the pages. He wrote a beautiful hand, like copperplate, and in the writing class, as well as the rest, he was facili princeps. Well might he look with scorn on my slovenly dress, my books all thumbed and torn, and on my handwriting, which was as ill to make out as heathen Greek. Well might he be held up to me as a shining light and an example. ‘Tammas Erskine, go out and wash your face; when will ye learn to be tidy, like Alexander Macpherson?’ ‘Tammas, your books are a disgrace; do ye no think shame when ye see the books of Alexander Macpherson?’ ‘For shame, Tammas, for shame; do ye ever see Alexander Macpherson sucking black man in the midst o' school?’ ‘Tammas, your handwriting is abomination; Alexander, set him a copy yourself, to show him how a lad should write.’

“It was just the same story when we went to college.

“We met there on our former footing; that is to say, he distinguished himself as usual, while I watched him from a respectful distance. Few words ever passed between us: for we had never been on soaking terms, either in or out of school. But the relationship between us was clearly understood. Sometimes, as he passed me in the street, wearing grandly his red college gown and his college hat, while I crept along with my gown on my arm, he would give me a patronizing nod; that was all. We began Greek together under Whitland, and moral philosophy under old Dr. Plainstones. It was the old story. He was the pet pupil of both professors. He drank in learning like his mother's milk. From the first Greek to the second and third I followed him laboriously, as a clumsy fledgling follows some splendid eagle, whom he seeks to emulate in vain.

“After we left college, I lost sight of him for some years. I believe he might have received a bursary, and gone to Oxford; but his father, proud as he was of his attainments, did not want to spoil him for trade, and withdrew him before he had completed his course. I myself took to pupil-teaching, having not yet decided to try my fortune in literature.

“But one day, fired by sudden enthusiasm, I wrote a long letter to the Glasgow Herald on some question of the day. It was printed next morning in all the glory of large type, and signed ‘Thomas Erskine.’ It was the proudest day of my life; but, alas! it was destined to be overclouded. Toward afternoon I entered a coffee-shop, and saw, in the compartment next to me, his head buried in the paper, a human figure. The paper was the Herald, open at the page containing my letter. I sat, blushing with all the pride of fresh-blown authorship. Presently the face looked up, and I saw, to my surprise, my old school-fellow, Sandie Macpherson. Our eyes met, but his stony orbs gave no sign of recognition. Then he turned to the paper again, and smiled! Yes, he was reading my letter. It might astonish the public, but it could not impose upon him. There were Latin and Greek quotations in it, and fragments of moral philosophy. How ashamed I felt of them, as I saw them come under his baleful eye! He smiled again, placed down the paper, paid his reckoning, and walked out of the shop without a word. I went home a miserable man. I might put on grand airs before the public; but one man knew my measure, and that man was Sandie Macpherson.

“I am not going to weary you—and myself—with a history of my literary struggles till I conquered the book-taster, the magazine editor, and the publisher, and became a recognized producer of the popular literary article. Years passed away. In the course of years I emigrated to London, on the invitation of John Still, the philosopher. Then I published my first book, and, as I have told you, it was a failure. I retrieved myself by my second, which was about half as good, and not near so earnest, as the first. I still had Glasgow and Sandie Macpherson in my mind when I failed or succeeded, but in course of time the impression grew dimmer and dimmer. It was one fine day that John Still, returning from the North, where he had been lecturing on some political subject, spoke to me as follows:

“By the way, Erskine, I met an old school-fellow of yours in Glasgow.”

“Ay, indeed?” I said, feeling the blood mount to my face in a moment.

“A man named Macpherson, a small tradesman, and a member of the local club which took me down. A prosy fellow, and very sarcastic. He amused me very much with his dry reminiscences of your school days, and seemed greatly astonished that you had made any mark in the world.”

“I forced a laugh, but I felt hot and cold all over.

“Do you remember him?” proceeded Still. “He remembers you wonderfully!”

“I am not sure,” I returned, with carelessness. “I believe there was a lad of that name in the class with me, but I've almost forgotten him. It's—it's a long time ago!”

“Hypocrite that I was! Did John Still know that I was lying? He looked at me for some moments with an amused smile, as if he were calling up some queer reminiscence; and I—I could have brained him. Some little time after that John Still and I fell out. He wrote a criticism on Suckle's ‘History of Civilization,’ and published it in the radical Lamb-beth Review. I handled the same book next quarter in the Caledonian, and turned Still's arguments inside out in no very complimentary fashion. Still was a sensitive man, and a while after that he cut me dead in the street. We made it up afterward, but were never the same as before. Till the day of his death I never gave him any explanation. I cared no more for Suckle or his arguments than for the fly on the wall! Suckle, indeed—the poor, silly, over-crammed Cockney gawk! The real cause of my attack on John Still was anger and irritation. Sandie Macpherson, again, was at the bottom of it all!

“A year or so after this I went down to Glasgow on business. By that time I had made a name for myself, and my visit caused a stir in the city. I stayed with Sir Robert Mungo, the Lord Provost—a silly man, with a sniggering taste for philosophy. After a few days I grew weary of being lionized; for nearly every time there was a grand dinner, and I was bored to death with the admiration of daft folk of both sexes. One afternoon, as I was wandering about the streets, looking at the old houses, and calling to mind the places I had known when a lad, I passed down the Gallowgate, and saw the name of ‘Alexander Macpherson’ over a small grocer's shop. Now, I was in a sympathetic mood that day; the contemplation of old scenes, and the thought of the kindness of my countrymen, had touched my heart, and it melted suddenly at the name of my old school-fellow. Could it possibly be the same? Before I knew what I was doing, I had entered the shop.

“Yes, I was right. There, standing behind the counter, was Sandie himself, older, grimmer, but neat and clean as usual. As I entered, he was measuring out a pound of moist sugar for a bare-footed servant lassie in petticoat and short gown.

“Mr. Macpherson?” I said, when he had done.

“He looked up, and our eyes met. I saw in a moment that he recognized me, but his face remained grim as granite, and his eye was cold as ice.

“That is my name,” he replied.

“I smiled, and prepared to hold out my hand.

“I think we were old school mates together. My name is Erskine—Thomas Erskine. Do you remember me?”

“He looked at me from head to foot. His eye rested on my old cloak, my broad-brimmed hat, and he nodded darkly, as he replied:

“I mind ye well enough. Can I serve ye with anything?”

“Nothing, thanks; only—I was passing, and I thought I should like to remind you of our old acquaintanceship.”

“As I spoke Sandie proceeded leisurely with his business behind the counter—opened his till and looked into it; took down a piece of loaf sugar, and began breaking it into small portions. He gave a sort of grunt as I finished my address to him, and nodded again; then, after a pause, while I stood hesitating, he observed quietly, surveying me critically from head to foot:

“Ye're staying up in London, I hear?”

“Yes.”

“Ye're what they call a leetery man, noo?”

“Just so,” I replied, smiling good-naturedly, but feeling rather ashamed.

“A weel,” said Sandie, reflectively, as he swept up his pieces of sugar and putting them into a large jar, ‘a weel, London's a big place, and they call it the centre of civilization; but—here he shut the lid of the jar sharply—‘mony things please the folk in London that wouldna gang doon in Glasgow!’

“What he meant I could hardly gather; it was a mere general reflection, but I felt somehow that it had a personal application. A long pause ensued. I stood awkwardly waiting in front of the counter, but Sandie did not seem inclined for further conversation. At last, feeling rather uncomfortable, I determined to put an end to the interview.

“Well, I'll wish you good-morning,” I said, moving to the shop door.

“Good-morning,” grunted Sandie, not raising his eyes from his desk and ledger, to which he had just gone.

“I walked out of the shop, indignant at the man's imperturbability. Glancing back from the pavement, I saw Sandie's face quietly regarding me over his ledger—and smiling—just as it had smiled when I saw him reading my first effort in literature. He was certainly quite irreconcilable.

“About this period of my career, as you may remember, I was particularly severe in my writings on the British Philistine, and on the sordid, self-conceited, money-grabbing secularity of the trading classes in this country. I denounced the hypocrisies of Sodom and the fleshpots of Gomorrah. The press took up my cry, and Philistinism had a bad time of it. Poor idiots, they thought that I had a grievance against society. Nothing of the kind. I was only trying to have my revenge on Sandie Macpherson!

“For wrestle as I might against him, the man had mastered me. Folk might compare me to John the Baptist preaching in the wilderness; but Sandie Macpherson knew better. Sandie saw through me! To the bedside of the heathen emperor a slave used to come each morning, saying: ‘Philip, remember you must die.’ To my bedside, for many a day, came the spirit of Sandie, saying: ‘Thomas Erskine, remember you're a poor creature, and I know it!’

“I thought to have my revenge on Sandie at last, the day they made me Lord Rector of the University of Glasgow.

“More proud and exultant than you can think, I went down to my natal city to deliver the rectoral address. I was an old man by this time, and had a great name all over the world. Such a reception as they gave me! As I stood in the large hall, with the professors and citizens around me, the students in their thousands cheering me, fine ladies in the galleries smiling down on me, I felt that I had reached the height of my ambition. I addressed them like a man inspired. I spoke of my early days, my struggles, my fondness for the country of my birth, and I was in the middle of a splendid peroration, when all of a sudden I became conscious of a man's face looking quietly up at me. One man's face in all that sea of faces! But I knew it only too well. Grim, cold, hard as granite, yet with a kind of pitying smile upon it—whose face could it be but the one I had dreaded all my life? The words went out of my head, and I ended feebly, sitting down into my chair with a sigh of relief when I had finished. The next day there were columns in the papers, and in the course of the long report something to this effect: ‘At this point of his discourse, alluding to his early days in this city, Mr. Erskine was visibly affected. His emotion was touching to witness, and he almost broke down; but amid the loud cheering of his enormous audience, he at last concluded his magnificent address.’ ‘Visibly affected,’ indeed! and ‘touching emotion!’ They little knew that my speech was nearly ruined by the sinister influence of Sandie Macpherson!

The great man paused, half amused, half angry, at the remembrance of his odd experience. Reaching up his hand, he took down a pipe from the mantelpiece, filled and lit it, and smoked for some minutes in silence, with his sad eyes fixed upon the fire. I sat watching him, reverently and wonderingly. At last he broke the silence:

“I never saw Sandie again after that.

“About a year ago, however, an old friend, a minister of the Kirk, coming on a visit from Glasgow, informed me that my former schoolfellow, who was one of his congregation, had recently died. My friend had been with him frequently during his last illness. I asked, not without anxiety, if the poor fellow had still remembered me?

“My friend smiled.

“Oh, yes; he remembered you well,” he replied, ‘and it was only a few days before his death that he spoke about you.’

“Indeed! and what did he say?” I said, carelessly.

“Shall I give you his very words?” asked my friend, laughing merrily.

“Certainly.”

“‘They're telling me,’ he said, ‘that Erskine has just written another book. Lord, minister, surely the world has gone clean daft! What can folks see in such a silly fool as you?’”

“So Sandie passed away,” concluded the old philosopher, “and now, whatever happens to me, I know that my career must be considered a failure; for the one dream of my existence, to make an impression on Sandie Macpherson, has been rendered impossible forever.”—Ed.

PUBLISHERS' NOTICE.

The Argonaut is published every Saturday, at No. 522 California Street, by the Argonaut Publishing Company.
Subscription, $4.00 per year; six months, $2.25; three months, $1.50, payable in advance—postage prepaid. City subscribers served by carriers at $4.50 per year, or 10 cents per week. Sample copies free. Single copies, 10 cents.
News Dealers and Agents in the interior supplied by the San Francisco News Company, Post Street, above Dupont, to whom all orders from the trade should be addressed.
The American News Company, New York, and branches, are Agents for the Eastern trade. The Argonaut can be ordered from any News Dealer in the United States or Europe.
Persons mailing single copies of the Argonaut must affix a two-cent stamp.
No traveling canvassers employed. Order by mail, or through your local News Dealer.
Subscribers wishing their addresses changed should give their old as well as new addresses.
Address all communications to "The Argonaut, 522 California Street, San Francisco."
A. P. STANTON, Business Manager.

ENTERED AT THE SAN FRANCISCO POSTOFFICE AS SECOND CLASS MATTER.

THE ARGONAUT.

FRANK M. PIXLEY Editor.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 30, 1882.

CONTENTS:

Page	Page
EDITORIALS:	SOCIETY:
Vale, Blaine!—Party Manipulators—The Sons of our Presidents—The Independent Vote—The Relaxing of Party Lines—Republican Demoralization—Washburne as a Presidential Candidate—Distress in Ireland—Why not Devote the "Skirmishing Fund" to—Senator Hearst, Governor Butler—The Charter-Makers and Spring Valley—An Episcopal Monkey—The Yellowstone Park—The Chronicle on Judge Field and Governor Stanford—What General Sherman Thinks—8-9	The Hopkins Party—Weddings, etc.—New Year Receptions—Notes and Gossip—4
WHY QUINCY SWORE OFF, By Dan. O'Connell—1-2	GOTHAM THEATRICALS: "Flan- cur's" Letter—5
VANITY FAIR—2	FLATSAM AND JETSAM—6
A BALLAD OF MADNESS—3	THE CRUISE OF THE ROVER. By Edmund W. Gosse—6
THE TROTTER-HORSE REPORTER 3	LITERARY NOTES—6
THE TEAL SHOOTING CLUB—5	SANDY MACPHERSON: A Prose Vignette, by Robert Buchanan—7
	LORNE AND LOUISE: Some Inter- esting Gossip from "Cockaigne," our London Correspondent—10
	STORYTELLERS—10
	INSTAGLIOS—11
	DRAMA:
	Betsy B.'s Letter—Stage Gos- sip—The Miscellaneous Muse—12
	THE TUNEFUL LIAR—14

We give up the Hon. James G. Blaine as a candidate for President with great reluctance. We give him up because he has himself recognized the fact that his candidacy is impracticable. This recognition of the political condition is creditable to his intelligence, and, we believe, to his patriotism; but it is not creditable to the intelligence or patriotism of those Republican leaders who have intrigued against him. He retires from public life, honored and admired by more Americans than any one of his living contemporaries. He possesses brains, courage, and patriotism. He has made his mark and left the impress of his Americanism upon the policy of the country. He is the first man who has seemed to fully comprehend the greatness and strength of American nationality. At all events, he is the only man to-day in prominent public position who would have the Government relations with foreign powers—all the way from Hawaii to England—as though the Republic of the United States of America had fifty-two millions of population, with brains enough, and courage enough, and money enough to improvise navies and armies in sufficient numbers and power to vindicate American nationality, wherever, whenever, and by whomsoever assailed. It is a shameful reflection that a few ambitious leaders at Washington can so manipulate the party machinery as to defeat the well-known and recognized fact that James G. Blaine is the choice of more than a large majority of the intelligent rank and file of the Republican party. We hold General Grant, Roscoe Conkling, Don Cameron, John A. Logan, Chester A. Arthur, and the lesser satellites that revolve within their orbits, responsible for this condition of things, and we, the Republican "tailors of Tooley Street," will hold them responsible, and we hereby resolve that they shall not themselves become candidates of the Republican party for President; and we further resolve that, if they do, we will punish them as they have punished Blaine, by bolting the Republican ticket and voting for a Democrat. We propose to put our own definition upon the word "bolt," for we, the disgruntled tailors of the Republican party, do not propose to allow the false plea to be made in the court of conscience that political cussedness begins at the end of a disastrous political intrigue. We propose to consider as party traitors and party bolters those men who form conspiracies, hatch plots, contrive party mischief, invite party political defeat, unless they are permitted to have undisputed rule. There are certain kinds of Democratic ruin that are better than certain kinds of Republican rule. If these political leaders at Washington do not see the portentous cloud—ever so much bigger than any boss's hand—now lowering in the Republican heavens, then they are stone blind and dead drunk. If these Washington bosses think to impose upon the party the hereditary incompetent of some illustrious sire, it will be a mistake. We are ever so proud of Adams, Harrison, Lincoln, Grant, and Hayes, but we tailors know the difference between sire and son. The same clothes do not fit and are not becoming. No John Quincy, nor William Henry, nor Robert. We won't have Buck Grant, or Jesse, or Rutherford Second to reign over us. The rule of breeding horses does not hold good in breeding boys. The sons of great men are seldom great. The great men we have named and honor have not transmitted to their sons any such distinguished characteristics as entitle them to be chosen from out the fifty-five millions that we will number in 1884, for the highest of executive positions. If Robert Lincoln or the senator named Harrison shall, by virtue of the fact that they are sons of Presidents, be nominated, we will not sit supinely cross-legged and accept the fact without inquiring how they were horn to greatness. We shall not, without cause shown, thrust greatness upon them, and they shall not achieve the greatness of the presidential office, or robe themselves in official garments, till we have taken their measures.

It is almost time that party leaders should give over the idea that the party units are fools. The American people are beginning to think. If an able man had been chosen by the Democracy instead of Hancock, if a statesman had been nominated instead of a soldier, he would have been elected. The Republicans are just in the frame of mind to DEMAND of their leaders an able and conscientious statesman as the next Republican candidate, and that this candidate shall be the choice of the people without the interference of the machine. If senatorial bosses dominate the next Republican National Convention, the Hon. Chester A. Arthur, President, will be succeeded by a Democrat, and this Democrat will be elected by Republican votes, as Cleveland was in New York, and as Stoneman was in California. The people are beginning to understand the subject of civil service reform, and that "reform" means something more than the education of tide-waiters, or fixity of official tenure to the lowest class of Government employees. The great fact which our politicians fail to appreciate, and are most unwilling to accept and most determined to ignore, is that there is growing up all over the nation a class of independent, non-partisan voters who care nothing for party organization, and have only contempt and hatred for party managers who are, or who attempt to play the rôle of, party leaders. This class of independent voters embraces most of the intelligence and wealth of the nation, and is continually growing in numbers and gaining in influence. Its influence was first felt in local elections. All over the land, since the final termination of the civil war, we have seen city, township, and county governments swing back and forth between the Republican and Democratic parties with the regularity of a clock's pendulum. Party rule relaxed its first discipline, or, the better way to express it, party discipline was first ignored in local elections. Then we heard of States in which the "Independents" exercised a large voice by uniting with whichever party gave promise of the best government. California has illustrated this tendency. Haight, Booth, Irwin, Perkins, and Stoneman have all of them owed their elections to the independent voters who were governed by the direct influence and conditions of the time. These non-partisan voters looked with contemptuous indifference upon primary elections, ward clubs, State conventions, or State Central Committees. They held bosses and managers in most hearty contempt, and proved indifferent to all appeals of party. The same spirit, displaying itself in New York and Pennsylvania, and, indeed, in all the Northern States, demonstrated that the day of party discipline in the Republican party had passed away forever. It only lingers longest in the Democratic party, because in most of the Northern States it has been in the minority. Minority parties are, after a time, more respectable and more virtuous than majority parties. The same sturdy spirit of independence and the same indifference to party rule will send these independent voters away from the Democracy, and over to the opposition, whenever the Democracy shall abuse its trust. Party discipline has held longer sway in the national party organizations for divers reasons. We Republicans were made to stand up to the party rack, fodder or no fodder, for ever so many years after the war had ended, under the plea of necessity to save the imperiled Union. We were impressed with the idea that it had only been half rescued from its danger by the consummation of the civil war. When our fears began to flag, we were stirred to patriotic recollections by the flaunting of the bloody shirt. Our imaginations were influenced by manufactured horrors. The people of the South acted madly and foolishly, and their resentments were kept alive by the insane acts of Democratic Southern fire-eaters. The passions of each section were played upon by politicians. We sent carpet-baggers and bayonets to rule the South, and the South killed negroes and polluted the ballot-box in defiance of the North. That period has passed. Then we were intimidated, because we feared that our national credit would suffer. We were gravely told that Democratic ascendancy meant recognition of the rebel war-debt, payment of war spoiliations, cotton bonds, and emancipated slaves; and so we have enthused ourselves at national elections—for Grant twice, for Hayes, and for Garfield—and it is, perhaps, well for the country that we have. The time has passed when there is danger to the national credit, or when recognition of the rebel war-debt is possible. The time is now come, as we believe, in national politics, when the same intelligent and patriotic independence is to rule national elections. The time has most certainly passed when, from Washington, senatorial bosses will be permitted to control national conventions. The shameful spectacle of the last Chicago Convention will not again repeat itself. Conkling has been humiliated and driven from public life. The Camerons, father and son, are no longer able to dominate Pennsylvania. Logan hangs by the skin of his teeth over the abyss of defeat in Illinois. Robeson, of New Jersey, and nearly all of the Congressional magnates who have fattened on spoils and grown insolent in office, have been retired from public life. The Senate is, in fact, Democratic. The House of Representatives is largely Democratic. The Presidential election comes in less than two years. The Republican party is divided, demoralized by defeat, and still in angry altercation between stalwart and half-breed, while the great independent, non-partisan class, that possesses the intelligence, owns the wealth, embodies the patriotism of the nation, and has the courage of its honest convictions, stands ready to vote for a Democratic candidate for President, if the party shall appeal to its reason by nominating a civilian, statesman, and honest man. The Republican leaders, and the Republicans in convention, will do well to heed this condition of things, if they expect the reaction to come in time for the Republican party to elect a President.

There is one man who fills all the conditions requisite for the successful presidential candidate of the Republicaocs, but whom, owing to a local cabal and the ingratitude of General Grant, it is impossible to nominate. The Hon. Elihu B. Washburne, of Illinois, ought to have been the presidential nominee of the Republican party when the senatorial intrigue and Grant's desire to nominate the Hon. Roscoe Conkling gave the nomination to Hayes. He ought to have been the nominee when the triumvirate of Senators, with Conkling at the head, conspired for the renomination of General Grant and nominated Garfield. He ought to be nominated at the next National Convention in spite of the party bosses, party conspirators, and party Senators who kiodly run the party, for us in the provinces, from headquarters in Washington. Washburne, of Illinois, is of large experience in national affairs, was for many years in Congress, was Secretary of State and Minister to France, and is a man of eminent capacity and of clean political record. He commands the respect and confidence of all who know him. He is neither stalwart nor half-breed, has been absent from the country during all these later years of political altercation and party jealousy, and there is no reason why any Republican or independent voter should not support him, unless some abler, purer, and more experienced statesman shall be nominated against him. One of the causes for the Republican cyclone of defeat which has swept across the continent lies in the defection of the German vote from the Republican party. Mr. Washburne's attitude toward the German nationalities during the Franco-German war, and the distinguished service he was enabled to render German people, by virtue of his position as United States Minister to France resident in Paris, will entitle him to the grateful and enthusiastic support of all Germans. When, in the event of his presidential candidacy, the story of the siege of Paris shall he told, the history of the Commune insurrection and the connection of Mr. Washburne with it, no intelligent German who loves his fatherland will withhold from him his earnest political support. We are very much inclined to think that Prince Bismarck and the Emperor William would contribute to the campaign fund. Mr. Washburne would carry California, and of all the suggested Republican candidates, except Mr. Blaine, is the only one who could. If we could nominate the next Republican presidential ticket, it would be the Hon. Elihu B. Washburne, of Illinois, for President, and the Hon. William Walter Phelps, of New Jersey, late United States Minister to Austria, for Vice-President; and so say we all on this side of the continent.

By way of London the information comes from Archbishop Croke and others that great distress prevails in Ireland, and that the outlook is a most gloomy and appalling one. People in certain parts of Ireland are on the verge of famine, and great apprehension is felt lest many shall perish for want of the necessities of life. It would be a great reproach to the generous spirit of the age if there were not prompt response to this appeal of suffering humanity. So deeply do we sympathize with these unfortunate breadless ones, that we would be glad if the Land-League patriots of Ireland had spent the same effort to provide the necessities of life to their suffering countrymen that they have expended in agitating for the non-payment of rent. We wish it were possible to so recall the events of the past that the tumultuous masses of people who have spent a portion of the past summer in political manifestations might have devoted that time to the cultivation of the potato. We wish the large amount of money, laid out by the English government for the preservation of the law and the maintenance of order, might have been used for the purchase of oat-meal and Scotch herring, and that the cattle houghed and slain could have been preserved in cans for the use of innocent people. We wish that the money contributed in America for the purchase of an iron-clad and secret skirmish fund against England, and for the maintenance of a Directory in Paris, and for the support of traveling patriots who have made their begging pilgrimages to America, who have robbed servant-girls, and swindled Irish laborers through demagogic appeals to their patriotism, who have agitated in Parliament and encouraged an ignorant population to violate contracts of lease made under the law, could have been hoarded for such a pitiable exigency as this. We would be glad if the money raised in San Francisco by Fenians, Land-Leaguers, political priests, and Democratic Irish demagogues, to be wastefully squandered upon a brood of evil agitators, could have been deposited in the Hibernia Savings Bank for the use of the poor and starving Irish women and children, who now sit in pallid want by desolate hearthstones, in hopeless despondence, and gaunt from famine. We wish all the hoh ferrals, and Judge Tooheys, and Mrs. Jerome Deasys in Ireland, America, and throughout the world, could have reserved their energies, their eloquence, and their songs for these extreme occasions, when those who refuse to work and pay their rent in Ireland and boycott those who do, when those who murder landlords from behind hedges and assassinate officials, bring desolation, want, and starvation to the Irish land. We wish that his grace, Joseph Sadoc, the Spaniard who is archbishop in San Francisco, had not taken up a subscription for his holiness, Monsignor Pecci, the Italian who is archbishop in Rome, but had permitted the Irish congregations of his faith to send their money to their starving countrymen in Ireland. We think it almost better to send food to a friend, relation, or countryman dying of hunger, than to build a Jesuit church or Roman cathedral in San Francisco. When Irish Catholic pietists will cease sending pence to Peter, and cease building architectural follies; when they will sell their superfluous lands, their church jewels, pictures, the gold bullion that adorns the sacred vestments of the priesthood, and the holy banners of their church, and send it in charity, to be distributed to starving men, women, and children in Ireland by Archbishop Croke, or John of Tuam, or any of the embryo saints of the Roman institution, we shall be glad to contribute our mite to the starving Irish. In the meantime, and until education shall bring enlightenment to the bigoted, priest-ridden, and politically oppressed of Ireland, we hope there may be no effort spared to relieve these unfortunate starving ones. No one should close his heart or button up his pocket against an appeal for charity because some politicians and some priests are knaves, demagogues, and hypocrites.

We do not quite understand the course of the charter-makers in reference to the future water supply. To us this business seems simple, if considered on rational, business principles. The Spring Valley Water Company has a valuable property, which the city can not steal. It supplies an indispensable necessity which consumers can not have without paying for. The new Constitution, which was passed when this water controversy was at its angriest, does away with free water. It compels the Supervisors to fix rates annually for consumers and for municipal use. The Supreme Court has declared the law to be this, and decided that free water is abolished, and that property is compelled to pay its just proportion of water-rates. The Constitution gives power to the city to form a charter, but this charter must be consistent with the new Constitution. If we understand the charter-makers, they are now endeavoring to violate the organic law by providing free water, and again by limiting the power of the Supervisors in fixing water-rates. If the Board of Supervisors have the power to fix rates, it is manifestly illegal, and, if not illegal, at least immoral, to compel them, in advance, to fix rates within such a minimum as the charter-makers may fix. The struggle has been made for years by the company to reduce rates to the consumer. This reduction is being fought by property. The company desires to equalize the water burden by imposing a just proportion of its rates upon property, where, by every principle of equity, common sense, and law, it really and justly belongs. These Freeholders have no power to fix rates for the use of water. They ought to know it, and doubtless do know it. This can only be done by the Supervisors. Again, as to the purchase of the water company's property: Mr. Bryant once, as Mayor, offered for this property eleven millions of dollars. The company will not sell it for less than sixteen millions. The investigation in 1876 demonstrated that it would cost to bring the waters of Lake Tahoe to San Francisco, without distributing, more than eighteen millions of dollars. There is not a man in the State, except Von Schmidt, who believes the Tahoe waters can be distributed in San Francisco for fifty millions of dollars. The Eldorado scheme was estimated (distribution not provided for) at sixteen millions of dollars; the San Joaquin scheme, thirteen millions of dollars; Feather River scheme, to bring the water to Saucelito, leaving it to be tubed under the bay and distributed, thirteen millions of dollars. How absurd, then, to enact a provision in the charter limiting the purchase of Spring Valley Water Company's property, with its complete organization and unlimited supply of water—embracing the Calaveras Valley—to nine millions of dollars. This seems to us like baby rattle. There is not one of the gentlemen engaged in making for us a charter who does not know that he is doing a vain thing. There are certain facts that must be kept distinctly in mind by law-makers, politicians, and consumers. The first is that the Spring Valley Water Works corporation owns a property that can not be taken from them, nor can they be deprived of its use, except by operation of law. Under the decision of the courts no person—artificial or natural—is entitled to free water. No one has any right to fix rates between company and consumer, except the Board of Supervisors; and property must pay its fair proportion. Rates must be compensative to the company, must pay interest, running expenses, dividends, and reserve for repairs. If the city desires to buy the works, it is a matter of negotiation, and the city must pay what they are worth, or it will not get them. Demagoguery over water business has cost the city of San Francisco ten million dollars. The whole plant might have been purchased at one time for a moderate price. Colonel Mendell—acting for the city and not for the company—said that the Blue Lakes scheme was of all outside ones the most practicable; he estimated its cost at eighteen million dollars, and after considering all the water projects suggested—among them San Joaquin, Blue Lakes, Clear Lake, and Putah Creek—gave it as his opinion that twenty-two millions of gallons of water daily could not be brought to San Francisco for less than eighteen million three hundred thousand dollars. In view of these figures we see no sense in attempting to obtain the Spring Valley Water Company's property for less than half its worth. Colonel Mendell also estimated that Spring Valley had a source of supply equal to eighty millions of gallons daily, or enough for a city of one million three hundred thousand inhabitants. It would be an interesting exhibition if the fifteen most honorable charter-makers owned the Spring Valley Water Works, and were negotiating its sale to the city, with the Bulletin employed to advocate the proposition for a contingent percentage of the amount to be paid. In view of these facts, the Bulletin deliberately figures the economies resulting from an ownership of water supply at eight millions of dollars, interest at four per cent. per annum, and cost of administration one hundred thousand dollars per year. It proposes a sinking fund, to pay the entire amount in twenty years; thus, all the cost of supply and purchase comes from consumers. Now, sixteen millions of dollars will not duplicate the Spring Valley works. Money is worth six per cent. interest, and one hundred thousand dollars a year would not cover half the cost of running a water company by politicians. All this the Bulletin knows; and we believe we do not overstate the fact when we say it deliberately misrepresents everything connected with this whole water controversy for some sinister personal interest. In the meantime, and as these angry altercations prolong themselves from year to year, the private consumer hears all the burden of water-rates, while real and personal property escapes without paying a dollar. There is an awful black nigger somewhere in this wood-pile.

Governor Stanford is in Washington, in attendance upon the Supreme Court of the United States. Eminent counsel—Senator Edmunds, ex-Senator Conkling, Judge Sanderson, and the Hon. Creed Hammond and others—are arguing what is known as the San Mateo Railroad case, a case upon which depends the payment by the Southern Pacific Railroad Company of a small amount of money, but involves important principles. The fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States is under discussion for interpretation. Mr. Justice Field, sitting with Judge Lorenzo Sawyer in San Francisco, had decided the case and rendered an exhaustive written opinion. Governor Stanford gave an informal supper to his counsel and friends in Washington. Mr. Justice Field, calling at the Arlington to see his friend Judge Sanderson, was informed that he was dining at Chamberlain's; he drove down and was ushered into the dining-room, where, saluting the guests—all of whom were old and intimate friends—he had a brief interview with Judge Sanderson, and took his leave. This unimportant and altogether innocent social incident is caught up by the spies of a political anti-monopoly society, given to the gossips of the Associated Press, and sent booming over the continent as a suggestion of improper relations between Governor Stanford and Mr. Justice Field. In the first place, there is no intelligent and honorable man who believes that Governor Stanford or his associates are guilty of the crime of bribing courts. Such scandals as this are scattered abroad by such dishonorable partisans as M. M. Estee; they are pronounced upon by such verdicts as the people rendered at the last election in this State. In the second place, the members of the Supreme Court of the United States are not justly amenable to the suspicion of corruption. Finally, if Mr. Justice Field were foolish and criminal enough to imperil his splendid judicial reputation for money—which he does not lack—he would be more secret and politic than to give himself away at a public banquet. Such conduct would not earn the bribe which the suggestion implies. Equally malignant, libelous, and devilish is the circular distributed in New York by the Anti-monopoly League, declaring that the Federal judges of California are not trusted and honored in the performance of their judicial duties. Judges do not live in England or America whose judicial integrity and purity are more irreproachable than those of Lorenzo Sawyer and Ogden Hoffman. In their long occupation of the bench—Sawyer as district judge, judge of the Supreme Court of California, and of the United States Circuit Court; and Hoffman for more than thirty years district judge—they have never in one instance had their honor questioned or their honesty impugned. Whatever shall be the decision of the United States Supreme Court in the San Mateo case, it will be remembered that Mr. Justice Field pronounced his opinion in California. It is clearly apparent that all this clamor of brass is raised to frighten the supreme tribunal of the nation from giving this case an impartial consideration. It is fortunate that we may hope the court will not be influenced by clamor.

We take it that Judge Folger, Secretary of State, is an ordinarily intelligent person; that in point of law-learning he is exceptionally accomplished; that he is a gentleman of high integrity, and, except as indicated by his letter accepting the gubernatorial nomination secured by fraud, forgery, and other slight and somewhat irregular political inconsistencies, a man of high moral qualities. We presume he knows the law governing the institution of marriage, and the sacred relation which wife holds to husband by virtue of the solemnization of the marriage ceremony before the Christian altar, and the force of civil bonds when forged by the civil magistrate under our laws. It is quite evident that Mr. Secretary Folger is not intelligent upon the relations existing between Chinese men and Chinese women who emigrate from Canton to California. He does not know the difference between a Caucasian prostitute and an American wife. He does not know that, under the law, usage, and custom of social life in China, the first wife—the wife of honor, the little-footed Chinese lady—very seldom comes to the Pacific Coast; that out of four thousand Chinese females on this side of the continent, there are not forty virtuous and honored women. He does not know that there is a guild of industry in this city of San Francisco that deals in female slaves, and that in China girls are sold, and transferred by hills of sale for a nominal consideration, to be shipped to San Francisco for infamous commerce. He does not know that the Chinaman is entirely oblivious to the sanctity of an oath; that for money he will take any of the hazards of perjury, and that a cargo of Asian harlots can, upon their arrival, be provided with husbands to enable them, under his most absurd decision, to evade the law against the Chinese invasion. Judge Folger most certainly does not know these things. If he does, we would be justified in denouncing him as a violator of the law of Congress passed for the protection of our coast. We will send him this copy of the Argonaut, with this article marked with a blue pencil, and ask the subordinate, whose duty it is to open and warm the daily journals received by the honorable Secretary of the Treasury, to be kind enough to give a momentary consideration to a question that we of the Pacific Coast sincerely believe affects the moral welfare of our people, and the highest interest of the young men and boys whom we are educating to support the Republican party, because it is a party of intelligence and moral ideas, and the only one that is likely to give us an administration and cabinet secretaries who will interpret laws in the interest and for the welfare of those communities which they were designed to protect. We ask the Hon. Judge Folger to recall the circular letter that gives to the Chinese slave-dealers, who buy and sell Asian harlots, the privilege of inundating our coast with this most dreadful curse.

In anticipation of the Presidential campaign of 1884, the political paragraph-maker is abroad. Senator Grover, of Oregon, says Mr. Justice Field, of California, will again be a candidate. The San Francisco Chronicle thinks he could not carry the electoral vote of this State. We think Judge Field would receive the electoral vote of California in event of his nomination, and we know of no reason why he should not. It was a shameful piece of blundering, treachery, and stupidity, the whole management of his last candidacy. He should not have been defeated by the delegates of this State. He would not have been, except through that treachery, ingratitude, selfishness, and cowardice the Irish element of the California Democratic

LORNE AND LOUISE.

British Opinions on a Head-strong Wife and a Hen-pecked Husband.

From a fashionable standpoint London still continues fairly full, notwithstanding the near approach of the prorogation of Parliament, and that the climax of national homage to the Egyptian troops was reached quite a fortnight ago, when the Queen in person reviewed her heroic soldiers in St. James's Park, and presented to a heroic few the medals their gallantry in the field had won for them. Aside from the grandeur of the affair as a military pageant, unequaled since the return of the army from the Crimea, nearly thirty years ago—when her majesty, to give more éclat to the event, rode about in a field-marshal's uniform above her habit skirt—the occasion was marked by the fact that every member of the royal family, with one exception, was present. The one exception was the Princess Louise.

It is pretty well known that she and her royal mamma don't hit it off together quite as a dutiful daughter and fond mother should, and that, when she is in England, her visits to Windsor, or wherever else the Queen may be living at the time, are neither so frequent nor of such long duration as might be expected from a child to a sole-surviving parent; and this, added to the fact that the princess's ways, manners, and general behavior when in England are not quite in accordance with the rules that govern the actions of the nobility—let alone royalty—have lost her, in a great measure, the admiration and respect which the other princes and princesses command so cordially from their mother's subjects. As a matter of course, people in high life have always deemed it expedient, as well as evincing a proper sense of loyalty to their sovereign, to frown down everything that has been said since the romantic episode with Canon Duckworth, with whom the princess's name was so uncomfortably coupled, and the consequent hurried marriage to the first young nobleman who would take her. Naturally, in a country like England, where the press feels the pressure of the royal gag, whatever is unbecoming or wanting in dignity in the actions of a prince or princess can be but alluded to, and even then the allusion must be indulged in but sparingly. Thus it is, that whatever any member of the royal family may do that would call for condemnation in the case of a subject, is either ignored by the press altogether, or glossed over as much as possible.

It is a great misfortune that this should be so, for not only does it give a favored few a right to do whatever they like, but it is apt to imperceptibly engender in the minds of the people at large a belief that princes inherit infallibility with their titles, and that like the sovereign who is the source of both, "they can do no wrong." Still, there are people in England who think, if they don't speak, and who, notwithstanding the pains and penalties of scandalum magnatum—a statute which punishes severely any utterances against a peer of the realm, even if true—are independent enough at heart to give their brains full scope in the drawing of inferences and deductions from what they hear and see.

However unadvisedly the Queen may comport herself as regards the Scotch gillie, John Brown, nowadays, a different example was set to her children during their earlier years, and during their father's lifetime. Their mother was then a discreet and careful woman, and there can be no question as to the model way in which her daughters were brought up. Their management and moral tuition was strict, almost to the verge of severity, and none of the five have ever given any occasion for "talk," except Princess Louise. Her marriage to Lord Lorne has doubtless had a good deal to do with it. English princesses always marry German princes; and as the royal family of England, so far as blood is concerned, is nine hundred and ninety-nine parts German, it is natural that they should. But the Duckworth episode called for a marriage too immediate to give time to hunt up a German prince that would be in all respects suitable. Numerous as the German princes are, the supply seemed to give out when it was most needed. So the expedient was hit upon to marry the princess to a subject. But to whom was the question. A list of eligible young noblemen, the eldest sons of prominent peers, was made out and submitted to the Queen. Of course, it was no secret whose names were down, and while her majesty was considering which one should have the distinguished honor of becoming her son-in-law, the young men had also time to reflect. They knew that their selection would be equal to a royal command, out of the doing of which there would be no getting, so some quietly and suddenly departed for lengthy tours in Africa, India, etc., while others married the first women who would have them in order to become ineligible before the selection could be made. The Marquis of Lorne was the only fellow left, and he got the prize. It was not that the other men didn't think the princess good enough for them. She was too good. She was then very pretty and attractive, and her free manners gave her a charm which all young men fancy in women. Yet they had sense enough to see how it would be. Could they have her for a wife, it would be well enough; but they didn't fancy being tied to a woman who was so far above them in rank that she wouldn't even take their name, and over whom, as a princess of the reigning family, they could not exercise the authority and control which all men desire to have the right to exert over their wives. Lord Lorne didn't seem to care about such things, however.

It was a curious marriage all through. The Duke of Argyll, Lord Lorne's father, is a radical who goes as far as he dares in the anti-throne doctrines of the party. It is an odd thing for a duke to do, especially one whose daughter-in-law is a princess. But he doesn't mind that. He would abolish the House of Lords to-morrow if he could, even though he kicked himself out of power with it. One of his sons is a stock-broker in the London Stock Exchange, and the only wonder is that the duke consents to retain his title. It would be decidedly more consistent with his other acts if he called himself plain Mr. Campbell. As to the Marquis of Lorne, he does just whatever his papa thinks best, and is more pitted in England than anything else. There are hundreds of men more fitted for the position of Governor-General of Canada than he, and his appointment to the post was a bit unfair to many men whose merits had earned them the position.

However, in several respects it was the best thing that could have happened. It was not so hard to play second to one's wife out of England as in it, and the Queen thought a five years' residence in Canada would be beneficial to her wayward daughter. At first the princess was given to sudden returns to England. Her mother would think her safely ensconced at the Government House in Ottawa, when she'd suddenly turn up, just arrived back alone in an Allan line steamer. She would stay in England and have a good time, and go back to her lord (but by no means master) when she couldn't disregard the Queen's commands any longer without raising a row at court. The last time she made one of her playful "drops in" from Canada on her mamma, she was ordered to return instantly and do the honors of the Governor-General's house, as they should be done by the Governor-General's wife, even if she did happen to be a princess. Well, she went back to Canada, but she didn't stay there. A pleasure trip overland to the Pacific—a "tour of the Dominion" it has been officially termed—was perhaps not such fun as being in England, but it was better than obeying orders by remaining in Ottawa.

And so the princess is thought to have rather scored off the Queen, after all. She generally manages to do pretty much as she likes, and contrives to enjoy herself in her own way. Yet, to be candid about it, she frequently does things that, were she but the Marchioness of Lorne, or any other "lady" of title, would not be tolerated in her. To say the least, she would be called "queer"; for, when in England, she travels about by train, quite alone, makes visits by herself to country-houses for a week or two, plays billiards, smokes, flirts a good deal; is very fond of the society of good-looking young noblemen; enjoys a good glass of wine as much as anybody, and never goes to church if she can possibly avoid it. In short, were she not a princess, one might feel inclined to say she was disposed to be "rapid." Comparatively independent of her mother, and totally so of her husband, there is no check upon her, and that's where it is. The poor marquis has to stand by and look on, and say nothing, for he hasn't as much authority with her as a younger brother would have. Why, he can't even go into dinner with her. Once, he did attempt to accompany her into some ante-room at court, where his rank did not entitle him to be; but the Prince of Wales ordered him out at once. One might feel inclined to be sorry for him, if he seemed to mind it, which he doesn't. Besides, he could have got out of the way, like the other fellows, if he had chosen. He and the princess have a small country place in Kent, near Tunbridge Wells, called "Dornden." Strange to say, it has been for sale for some years, the price asked being thirty thousand pounds.

Of the Queen's sons, the Prince of Wales comes in for the largest share of talk. Now and then the startling escapade of some titled scoundrel may temporarily attract more attention, but when public interest in it dies out the prince is ever able, ready, and seemingly not unwilling, to furnish new food for the gossip of Belgravia boudoirs and club smoking-rooms. But, though he will flirt and amuse himself—not always as an heir-apparent to the throne should—with pretty women like Mrs. Langtry, Mrs. Cornwallis-West, Mrs. Wheeler, and Miss Chamberlain, and will run into debt for jewels for Sarah Bernhardt and Nelly Farren, there is one thing to be said in his favor. He never does anything undignified, or out of perfectly consistent keeping with his princely position, so far as actions in public are concerned. He is a great stickler for forms and ceremonies, and will resent even the approach to familiarity at the hands of anybody. If he is a prince he believes in being one—in public at all events, whatever he may be in private life. With his "set" he will unbend and go for a lark with any of them, but elsewhere he is the Prince of Wales, and he exacts the outward respect due to his rank, if he does not get it really. The Duke of Edinburgh is a cold, calculating, close-fisted man, with neither many warm friends nor many enemies. He is almost miserly in his fondness for money, and when at sea he has been known to make a considerable sum by the sale of his mother's autographs. When not at sea he lives a quiet life with his wife, the Russian Czar's only sister, and, for a princely amateur, is a fairish performer on the violin. The Duke of Connaught is the most popular of all the princes. He is a great popularity-hunter, and there are some people who say he rather overdoes it. He makes a point of taking much interested notice of other people's children, and there is nothing in which he appears to take greater delight than getting a chair for an old lady, or handing round the cake at an afternoon tea. His popularity has been somewhat dimmed of late by the rather obscure part the Guards were forced to take in the Egyptian campaign, owing to his having been put in command of them, and the consequent necessity that he should be kept out of danger. The Duke of Albany is the "goody-goody" member of the family, as he is the baby. He has never been known to do anything to call forth remark, either good or bad. He lives as happily on his twenty-five thousand a year, with his German wife, as his malady—said to be an insufficiency in the thickness of his skin—will let him.

One of the chief topics of interest of late is the somewhat sudden social collapse of Miss Chamberlain. To be snubbed by the Princess of Wales was bad enough, but to experience the chilling effect of the cold shoulder from the Prince was more than she thought she had a right to expect. To have the princess refuse her hand she could outlive, but when the prince's ball at Sandringham was announced, and day after day went over without invitations being received by the Obio beauty and her ambitious mamma, it began to dawn upon them that the visit to Homburg was a mistake. It was indeed a sad cut, and people are talking of it yet. Of course, the young lady's career of prince-given notoriety—as unenviable as it was precarious—is now at an end; and the sooner her dark-haired, rather over-dressed mamma takes her fair-haired daughter—who thought she was going to be the rage in London till some duke begged her to marry him—back to the beautiful home in Euclid Avenue, the better it will be. I fancy she wouldn't mind talking to a baronet now. It ought to be a lesson to other American girls, or rather their mothers; for had not Mrs. Chamberlain quite lost her head over the honor of having her daughter taken up for the nonce by the prince for his amusement, she would never have permitted the affair to reach a point so advanced as to call for the resentment of the Prince's wife.

COCKAIGNE.

LONDON, December 11, 1882.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

Etiquette should always be preserved under any circumstances. Serpa Pinto, the famous explorer, relates the following ludicrous incident of his travels in South Africa: At a point on the Zambesi River he met Doctor Bradshaw, an English naturalist, who was reduced to the greatest misery, and had nothing but rags, and very few of those, to cover his nakedness. So meager was his wardrobe that he presented himself in his drawers to Serpa Pinto, to whom, however, with true British formality, he handed his card, engraved in London, before saluting him.

"Gather me closer, darling," whispered Gladdys McMurry, gazing up into the sad blue eyes that but faintly illumined the marble pallor of Bayard Fautleroy Ferguson's alabaster brow. "Sweetness," he responded, with a strange, sweet, Palmer House smile, "I am not gathering so much as I was; but when the first snowy touch of Winter's frost-gemmed hand"—The continuation of this interesting serial will be found in the Chicago Tribune. A celluloid coffin given away with every copy.

A lieutenant of the navy, while on the South Atlantic station recently, had a commission from the manufacturers of a new rifle to try and sell a lot of them to Dom Pedro. The lieutenant intimated, through the proper channels, that he should feel honored if the emperor would examine the gun. His majesty readily granted an audience, and the young officer went to the palace with a very fine specimen rifle, which had been presented to him by the company. The gun was exhibited and explained, and then handed to the emperor for examination. Dom Pedro took it, said, in Portuguese, that he was "awfully obliged," and motioned the chamberlain, or some other functionary, to show the gentleman out. There was no help for it, and the lieutenant backed to the doorway and withdrew without his rifle.

The late Professor Palmer who was killed in Egypt was a great practical joker. Not long ago he repeated on a wager Garrick's old joke of frightening the driver of the cab he had hired to convey him home from the theatre. Just before reaching the end of his journey he called out to the coachman to stop, and then leaped out at the other side before the cabby had time to open the door. The amazement of the cabman was unbounded. He looked everywhere for his passenger, but, of course, in vain, and at last, perplexed beyond measure, got up on his box and drove off. Soon after, the professor having borrowed a hat and ulster of a friend who held the wager, and who followed close behind, called the cab and got in again. Presently he repeated the same manoeuvre of leaning out of the right-hand window to tell the cabman to stop. Meanwhile he had again jumped out at the left-hand side and ran to the pavement unperceived by the driver. Again the same consternation and the same perplexity. After proceeding a little way cabby was bailed by one of the professor's friends, but he shook his head in evident affright, and exclaiming, "No; darn me if I take another fare; I have driven the devil twice already tonight," drove off at a perilous gallop, while the wager was pronounced fairly won.

A bachelor lawyer at the Luzerne bar, says a Pennsylvania paper, has a pretty cousin, at each recurrence of whose birthday he is esteemed entitled to the cousinly privilege of a kiss, though he always has to fight for it. Lately the birthday having gone by during a business trip on which he was away, he asked if he might not have his kiss notwithstanding. To this she strenuously objected. She paid no bills, she said, when the creditor allowed pay-day to pass without calling on her. He proposed a game of euchre, on which he would stake a pair of gloves against his cousinly privilege. She agreed and she won. Then he staked a box of hankies. She assented and won again. Then handkerchiefs, stockings, and other articles of female apparel and adornment were put up, and the bachelor's luck grew no hotter. They played eleven games, and she was victor in them all. Being in Philadelphia a few days later the loser called at a leading dry goods house to make his purchases. It was not difficult to ask for the gloves and the handkerchiefs, but when it came to the stockings he was nonplussed. Finally, he left it to the shop-girl, who sold him an even dozen pairs, saying: "These long ones will do if she wears suspenders; the others are the ones she wants if she doesn't wear them." As the lawyer couldn't say how this was, he took the whole lot.

Old Ned's son returned from college the other day, says the Arkansas Traveler. The old man had looked forward to the event, and had arranged a dinner, to which he invited a large number of acquaintances. The young man was modest, and, to the great humiliation of his father, made no attempt to display his learning. The old man waited several days, and when at last he saw no evidences of his son's education, he approached him and said: "Jim, it do seem ter me dat yer's putting yer edycation ter a mighty po' use. I ain't heard a big word from yer yet. I can un'erstan' yer gist as well as I did 'fore yer went ter dat school. Ef a man's edycated I wants him ter talk so I can't un'erstan' him. Me an' yer mudder hab been talkin' 'bout dis matter, an' we'se grieved way down in de flesh. Jim, what's de big word for grasshopper?" "Orthopterous insect of the genus gryllus, according to Webster," replied the young man. "But de tuther day when dem folks was heah yer spoke ob a grasshopper jest de same as de ignorestest nigger in de country, an' brought shame down on de heads of yer mudder an' myself. What's de big word fur goat?" "Mammiferous quadruped of the genus capra," answered the young man. "But why didn't yer say so, 'stead of sayin' goat, like a nigger, an' bringin' de tingle ob embarrassment ter yer fader's face? What did I gin yer dat schoolin' fur—ter talk like a unedycated son ob a po' white man? Think dat I'se gwine ter keep yer heah in idleness 'lessen yer ken reflect credic on de family? Jim, what is de big words fur blamed fool?" "I don't know, sir." "Yer doan't? Den yer ain't 'quainted wid yersef. Yer doan't recognize whar yer stands. Go out dar in de field wid a mule an' identify yourself."

INTAGLIOS.

Only the Sunny Hours.
Only the sunny hours
Are numbered here—
No winter-time that lowers,
No twilight drear.
But from a golden sky
When sunbeams fall,
Though the bright moments fly—
They're counted all.

My heart its transient woe
Remembers not;
The ills of long-ago
Are half forgot;
But childhood's round of bliss,
Youth's tender thrill,
Hope's whisper, Love's first kiss—
They haunt me still!

Sorrows are everywhere,
Joys—all too few!
Have we not had our share
Of pleasure, too?
No Past the glad heart cowers,
No memories dark;
Only the sunny hours
The dial mark.

—E. C. Stedman.

For a Sun-Dial.

The shadows on the dial fall,
But who can tell
How soon a cloud may end them all—
And life as well.

—Anon.

Trials.

Pray, pray, thou who also weepest,
And the drops will slacken so;
Weep, weep—and the watch thou keepest
With a quicker count will go.
Think—the shadow on the dial
For the nature most undone,
Marks the passing of the trial,
Proves the presence of the sun.

—Elizabeth B. Browning.

Sun-Dial.

The shadow on the dial's face
That steals from day to day,
With slow, unseen, unceasing pace,
Moments, and months, and years away;
This shadow, which, in every clime,
Since light and motion first began,
Hath held its course sublime;
What is it, mortal man?
It is the scythe of Time.
Not only o'er the dial's face,
This silent phantom, day by day,
With slow, unseen, unceasing pace,
Steals moments, months, and years away;
From hoary rock and aged tree,
From proud Palmyra's moldering walls,
From Teneriffe, towering o'er the sea,
From every blade of grass, it falls;
And still where'er a shadow sweeps,
The scythe of time destroys,
And man at every footstep weeps
O'er evanescent joys.

—James Montgomery.

"I Note None but the Cloudless Hours."

There stands in the garden of old St. Marc
A sun-dial, quaint and gray,
And it takes no heed of the hours that dark
Pass over it day by day.
It has stood for ages among the flowers,
In the land of sky and song;
"I note none but the cloudless hours,"
Its motto the whole day long.

So let my heart in this garden of life
Its calendar cheerfully keep,
Taking no note of the sorrow and strife,
Which in shadow across it creep,
Content to dwell in this land of ours,
In the hope that is twin with love,
And remember none but the cloudless hours
Till the day-star dawn from above.

—William Crosswell Doane.

A Sun-Dial Inscription.

Morning Sun—"Tempus Volat."

O early passenger, look up—he wise,
And think how, night and day, time onward flies.

Noon—"Dum tempus habemus, operemur bonum."
Life steals away—this hour, O man, is lent thee
Patient to work the work of Him who sent thee.

Setting Sun—"Redibo, tu nunquam."

Haste, traveler, the sun is sinking now;
He shall return again, but never thou.

The Sun-Dial.

"Horas non numero nisi serenas."*

"I note not the hours except they be bright."

The sun when it shines in a clear, cloudless sky,
Marks the time on my disk in figures of light.
If clouds gather o'er me, unheeded they fly,
"I note not the hours except they be bright."

So when I review all the scenes that have passed
Between me and thee, be they dark, be they light,
I forget what was dark, the light I hold fast,
"I note not the hours except they be bright."

—Samuel F. B. Morse.

* In traveling on the Rhine, some years ago, I saw on a sun-dial at Worms the above motto; the beauty of its sentiment is well sustained in the euphony of its syllables. I placed it in my note-book, and have ventured to expand it in the stanzas which I dedicate to my young friend A—, sincerely praying that the dial of her life may ever show unclouded hours.

—DEBILITATED PERSONS AND SUFFERERS FROM wasting diseases, such as consumption, scrofula, kidney affections, will be greatly benefited by using Brown's Iron Bitters.

TO HOUSEKEEPERS.

If you wish to use goods of full weight and absolute purity, see your grocer supplies you with

KINGSFORD'S

OSWEGO

STARCH.

ROYAL

BAKING

POWDER.

WALTER BAKER & CO.'S

CHOCOLATE.

SMITH

BROTHERS'

PACKAGE

BORAX.

WM. T. COLEMAN & CO.

AGENTS,

121 and 123 Market Street,

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

ATTRACTIONS!

Our selections for the coming Holidays are exceptionally fine, and embrace the largest assortment of articles pertaining to the DIAMOND, WATCH, JEWELRY, and SILVERWARE business to be found in the State, and we are selling at close prices. All goods are marked in plain figures, from which no deviation is made.

GEO. C. SHREVE & CO.

110 MONTGOMERY STREET.

NEW YEAR CARDS

FOR GENTLEMEN,

In a countless variety of designs, grave and gay, plain and decorated, suitable for one or more callers; engraved or printed, and ready when promised.

FOR LADIES,

Announcing New Year receptions, in many novel and elegant styles, with envelopes accompanying. Special designs of "At Home" cards furnished. Orders promptly executed.

AT BANCROFT'S.

ESTABLISHED 1858.

W. K. VANDERSLICE & CO.

MANUFACTURING

JEWELERS AND SILVERSMITHS.

AMERICAN WATCHES, CHATELAINES in Gold and Silver, DIAMONDS in single stones and matched pairs, and an elegant line of JEWELRY, including all the latest novelties for HOLIDAY GIFTS, at the very closest prices.

136 SUTTER STREET.

OPEN EVENINGS.

THOMAS DAY & CO.

122 AND 124 SUTTER STREET,

Have now in a complete assortment of BRASS, BRONZE, BISQUE, FAIENCE, and other RARE ORNAMENTS for the HOLIDAYS.

The Choicest Designs in GAS FIXTURES and RARE LAMPS are arriving daily.

Munyadi Janos

THE BEST AND CHEAPEST NATURAL APERIENT WATER.

"SUPERIOR TO ALL OTHER LAXATIVES."

"SPEEDY, SURE, AND GENTLE."—Prof. Roberts, F.R.C.P. London.

The most certain and comfortable cathartic in cases of sluggish liver or piles.

ORDINARY DOSE, A WINEGLASSFUL BEFORE BREAKFAST. OF ALL DRUGGISTS AND MINERAL WATER DEALERS.

NONE GENUINE BUT WITH A BLUE LABEL.

FOR SALE BY RUHL BROTHERS,

522 Montgomery Street, Cal.

S. P. COLLINS & CO.

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL

dealers in Old London Dock Brandies, Port Wine, Sherries, and all the choicest brands Champagne, Apple Jack, &c. &c. Crosby Times, &c. &c. STON.

GOMERY, and 511 CALIFORNIA STREETS, S. F.

J. C. MERRILL & CO.,

Shipping and Commission Merchants

204 and 206 California Street.

The Regular Dispatch line of H.

One of the first requirements of a comedy is wit. It is supposed to be illustrative of the foibles of human life, and we are all much given to laughing at that which we should cry over, if it be garnished with those playful tricks of language which tickle the intellectual fancy. If "My Son-in-Law" had a sparkle of wit here and there it would be a very successful comedy, for it deals with that not infrequent episode, the attempt of a young man on the eve of marriage to be well off with his old loves before he is on with the new. The young man in question has a liberal and quite varied assortment of them, beginning with the subdued young miss, upon whom he purposes to confer the honor of marriage, and winding thence through a labyrinth of stormy temperaments. The first is his washerwoman. The washerwoman as an object of adoration is an innovation. She fails utterly to appeal to a California audience in this light, because we are all accustomed to seeing the family clothes-basket carried by a pig-tailed heathen. Although the man does not live who will not flirt with a pretty servant-maid when he finds a chance, there is a certain association of ideas which makes the washerwoman an unpopular object in this part of the country. The pretty French girl who carries home the laces always manages to come upon the stroke of the dinner hour, when the gentlemen are at home. But a woman washes differently in French, and this small class of flirtation is honored in the observance. The washerwoman episode counts for little in "My Son-in-Law," and it is only when the portentous mother-in-law puts herself upon the moral trail of the young man that his love affairs begin to look up. His second passion is a Mexican with the euphonic name, Joaquina. She is the wife of the young man's dancing-master, and is one of the women who take a great deal of comfort in a concealed passion. There is sometimes considerable embarrassment in finding a suitable object upon which to expend it; but upon the whole, a concealed passion need never go a-begging, for it is one of the freaks of freakish nature that every fool has its twin. The Joaquina of the play is not excessively Mexican. The young lady who plays it does not even trouble herself so far as to indulge in the make-up of a señorita—a costume as simple and easy as it is characteristic and striking. As she fails to distinguish herself in any other way, the part, for so assumptive a one, is decidedly colorless. As much can not be said for the young man's next love, in which the actress's own individuality so overrides the part she plays that one altogether forgets whatever name she may bear in the comedy, and remembers her only as Miss Alma Stuart Stanley. Miss Alma Stuart Stanley represents an ex-variety actress who years for the emotional drama, but has the variety instinct still strong within her, and represents her with an apparent faithfulness which is quite startling to the dress-circle. Miss Stanley is magnificently tall and dashing handsome, and daintily—well, realistic. She appears to have a first-class variety or burlesque voice, which is heavily obscured by a very bad cold—indeed, seems altogether like a burlesquer in unaccustomed skirts. And yet she can not be a burlesquer, for she gave a song and dance which were absurdly bad—the song, because she sang it execrably, and the dance, because she danced execrably, because her shoes nettled badly, and because there is something incongruous in a woman of superb height in a Camille-like dress, and with what, with proper cultivation would be a grand beauty, dancing a cheap break-down. Cheap! What an ugly little word it is, and how much it conveys. It describes the entire performance of "My Son-in-Law." It is all cheap—cheap humor, a cheap plot, and a cheap company. Mr. Leonard Grover himself is the only actor of any pretension in the entire cast. His Bisbon, the dancing-master, is rather a happy character bit. Its most salient point is a shining white tile. The only excuse for his appearance anywhere and everywhere, is that his entire clientele is among the dramatis personae. How he manages to get them all at Coney Island who can say? It is the cleverest trick in the play, and all the amusing contretemps occur there, though every point is strained a trifle. Yet as one goes to see a comedy to laugh, and laughs here only, it is accountable for whatever of success "My Son-in-Law" has had. The bouncing, boisterous, formidable mother-in-law raises the laugh, but there is always something intrinsically funny in any one's mother-in-law, just as there is always something irresistibly amusing in the falling from grace of a good old man. In truth it is a tragedy, in fiction it is the basis of much comedy. Mr. Leonard Grover Jr. plays the part of the sinning old man with a juvenile friskiness which altogether robs it of any effect as a moral lesson, but seems to add much to his own personal enjoyment. The sinning young man is simply an axis. The play is only one more of the "Pink Dominoes" family, with the usual strong family resemblance. Talking of family resemblances, have you not met people with perfect manias for tracing them? They should persistently follow the changes of bill in the theatres where old acquaintances are continually popping up. At the Grand Opera House, where upon the bills to the simple name of "Youth," is affixed the explanation of the authors, the explanation that "Youth" is a social, moral, domestic, emotional, and melodramatic spectacle, besides the time-honored villain, and the well-preserved adventures, there are perfect reminiscences of "A Celebrated" that rarely played but stirring little "Jessie Brown, or the Relief of Lucknow,"

Yet, withal, the authors have attempted little more than a spectacle, and have written up to the scenery with a conscientiousness which has made the fragment of drama very enjoyable. Francisque Sarcy complained bitterly concerning the recent revival of "Le Roi s'Amuse," that the realism of the mise en scene superseded the interest of the occasion, that the roll of very real thunder drowned out the might of the poet's lines—that the scenic artist, in short, planted seven-league boots on the grand old poet's domain. But in this lesser play of a newer age, one is astonished to look back at the paucity of the lines when one remembers the thrilling shift of scenery. A little boat, which seems to glide down the Thames, is at a standstill, while the beauties of the famous river unfold themselves, and nothing else takes place but the shift of scenery. There is a brilliant ball-room, with the inevitable conservatory, a crystal chandelier, a vision of revolving waltzers, and the traditional two gentlemen in dress suits in the foreground, with a pocketful of insults for each other, the gentlemanly villain, high in office, and the innocent, betrayed, much complicated hero, who is unjustly accused and convicted. There is a scene among the convicts, which amounts to little; for in the next act the hero, out on a ticket of leave, has become a soldier, and is bound for the wars on a big troop-ship, which is a stage-mechanical wonder. She slips her moorings, and swings off with the tide, and as she moves away, laden with the red-coats, and the Union Jack dipping, the British hearts in the audience were fired to fervor, and they cheered to the echo. The scene itself is a nice exhibition of drill, and calculated, in point of numbers, to give full effect to the favorite declaration of the British sailor that—

"Britons never, never shall be Married to a mer-maid
At the bottom of the deep blue sea."

But the real triumph of "Youth" is in the sixth tableau, where the curtain rises upon a high rocky crag, with two waterfalls shimmering in the calcium, and a group of soldiers in the hilly foreground ready to fight "for God and St. George"—they do not give any vivid reason why. We only know that the fight is against the black-skinned who are in ambush, that a sudden intrenchment is built, behind which the soldiers fight, almost, it seems, with the spirit of a real battle. There is a rattle of muskets, a blinding smoke, a flash of red coats, the inspiring smell of gunpowder, the no less inspiring glare of calcium lights, the warcries of the soldiers, a thrilling tableau against a beautiful background, and we have had one of the best of all the spectacles with which we have lately been inundated. Its name, "Youth," is utterly inconsequent. Almost every one in it is rather an old party, and the play was doubtless christened hap-hazard. As a spectacle with an outlined plot running through it, it is quite satisfactory. As a social, moral, and domestic drama, it is funny, for the clergyman has been guilty of a youthful indiscretion, the women are sadly world-wise, the villain has no tact, and there is no heroine.

At the Bush Street Theatre, the Leavitt Specialty Company have brought little new with them, and of the new the St. Felix sisters are the only striking feature. I saw in a funny little story the other day an experienced actress's advice to an expectant debutante. "I have neither looks, nor voice, nor talent," said the elder woman, "and I have made my way to where I stand only by my attention to make-up. I never put anything on carelessly. I give the minutest attention to every detail, and I have never known such attention to be lost. There is not a point so little but that it will be taken by some one. In short, my dear, your appearance is three-quarters of the battle." I thought of this when the three St. Felix sisters came out in all their panoply the other night—first in those irresistible little Mother Hubbards, next in those striking conceits in scarlet and black, and lastly in red, as miniature drum-majors. Every costume was unexceptionable, and the three little women, for all their shrill, piping little voices and their meaningless songs, took immensely. It was all in their costumes, yet the costumes laid away in a box would be as uninteresting without the three little women in them, as the three little women without them proved to be in that awful afterpiece, in which it is the custom of all variety companies to take off the good impression that each one has so carefully and painfully made. Miss Flora Moore returns with her budget unchanged, but her mammoth note slightly lessened in volume. The others go to form the usual combination of Irish, Dutch, and negro specialists, with Mademoiselle Alphonse, a globe revoler, and a rather clever ventriloquist thrown in. But the specialists' profession does not seem to widen as it might, considering the compass of its definition, and one waits in vain for something really new.

BETSY B.

Oliver Ditson & Co., of Boston, send us the following numbers which they have lately published: "A Sarabande," a dance by Aug. Dupont; "Serenade March," by Aubert, 40 cents; "Bouquet Galop," 40 cents; and "A Red Moss Polka," 40 cents, which belong to a set of twenty flower pieces by Mack. There are also three songs by Robert Franz, named, "When the Spring Blooms," 30 cents; "Transformation," 30 cents; and "Summer Time," 30 cents. A "Benedictus," by Kotschmar, 50 cents; a "Birth-day Galop," with Mrs. Langtry's portrait, 40 cents; and "Longing for Home," a piano piece by Strelezki, 25 cents, complete the set.

At the California "The Naiad Queen" has been running during the week to fair houses. The chief attraction is the performance of Ariel, whose flights through the air, into the flies, and out over the footlights, are most extraordinary. The Girards, too, with their "Aesthetic Quadrille," are most amusing.

Theodore Wores has completed the portrait of John W. Taylor which is designed to hang in the City Hall, and it will be on exhibition at Morris & Kennedy's December 29th and 30th.

I have read or heard somewhere the following, says a writer in Baltavia: An Irish balliff, accustomed to send a faithful account of the state of domestic arrangements, added, in his letter to his master: "We have a large number of emu eggs, which, in your lordship's absence, I have set under a goose."

They have now at the restaurant of the New York Racquet club a cook famous for the variety of ways he can prepare and serve macaroni. Macaroni dinners prepared by this culinary artist from "Sunny Italy" are said to be delicious.

An Iowa paper says that if beer is not intoxicating there is no use drinking it. One might as well waste time drinking water.

THE MISCELLANEOUS MUSE.

Snow-Flake.

We parted in the winter;
And from the distant hill
She watched my ship sail outward
O'er the waters cold and still.
I could not see the tear-drop
That glistened in her eye;
Nor her dainty kerchief waving
Against the frosty sky.
But I knew her heart was breathing
A gentle word of prayer;
I knew her eye was streaming,
And her kerchief waving there.
I said before I left her,
"Farewell, my love, farewell,
I am sailing to the sunshine,
And the land where myrtles dwell;
But still my longing fancy
Will turn to rest with thee;
My Snow-flake on the mountain
Is more than all to me!"
You know how the pure snow melted,
When the winter's cold is sped;
Ay, so before that ship returned,
My sweet Snow-flake was dead.
—All the Year Round.

Life.

My life is like the summer rose
That opens to the morning sky,
But ere the shades of evening close,
Is scattered on the ground to die!
Yet on the rose's humble bed
The sweetest dew of night are shed,
As if she wept the waste to see—
But none shall weep a tear for me!
My life is like the autumn leaf
That trembles in the moon's pale ray;
Its hold is frail, its date is brief,
Restless, and soon to pass away!
Yet ere that leaf shall fall and fade
The parent tree will mourn its shade,
The winds bewail the leafless tree—
But none shall breathe a sigh for me!
My life is like the prints which feet
Have left on Tampa's desert strand;
Soon as the rising tide shall beat,
All trace will vanish from the sand;
Yet, as if grieving to efface
All vestige of the human race,
On that lone shore loud moans the sea—
But none, alas, shall mourn for me!
—Anon.

Suspiria.

Take them, O Death! and bear away
Whatever thou canst call thine own;
Thine image, stamped upon this clay,
Doth give thee that, but that alone.
Take them, O Grave! and let them lie
Folded upon thy narrow shelves,
As garments by the soul laid by,
And precious only to ourselves.
Take them, O great Eternity!
Our little life is but a gust,
That bends the branches of thy tree,
And trails its blossoms in the dust.

A Dream.

I'll sail away in my light canoe,
Across the raging main;
I'll roam alone on a foreign isle,
Where the wild-birds sing, and the sun will smile,
And I'll ne'er come back again.
I'll moor my boat on a river bank,
Beneath a spreading palm,
Where the sweet buds bloom and the flowers blow,
And all the reeds and the grasses grow,
Near by the river calm.
I'll sit at night on the foreign shore,
Near to the waters blue,
Where the tall palms shake and the bamboos shiver,
And all the reeds and rushes quiver,
And dream, my darling, of you.
ANNA LOUISE HAZELTINE.
LOS ANGELES, December, 1882.

In the Matter of Rest.

Judge Bleckley, of the Supreme Court of Georgia, having resigned, read the following verses on the conclusion of his last opinion. The verses may be found in 64 Ga., p. 452:

Rest for my hand, and brow, and breast,
For fingers, heart, and brain!
Rest and peace! A long release
From labor and from pain:
Pain of doubt, fatigue, despair—
Pain of darkness everywhere,
And seeking light in vain.
Peace and rest! Are they the best
For mortals here below?
Is soft repose from work and woes
A bliss for men to know?
Bliss ofttime is bliss of toil:
No bliss but this, from sun and soil,
Does God permit to grow.

Wilhelmina—A Portrait.

A patient sadness in the lovely face
That melts to tenderness within the eyes,
Now dark, now bright, as in the dew-drop lies
A shadow brightening in a sunny place;
Deep dimples in the cheeks that overflow
When laughter rises from the brimming heart;
Soft folds of lustrous hair; lips half apart,
As if a kiss escaped and left them so;
One fair hand thrown aside in careless gesture,
To grasp the rose down-fallen in her vesture;
The rose is passing sweet, yet lack its grace
To keep me longer from that sweeter face!
—Clifford Lanier.

Obscure Intimations.

"What She Told," K. L. C.—Too late for Christmas number. Declined. —M. E. F.—Man thanks for the verses. —"In the Death Station," E. F. D.—Declined. —"The Wood Cutter's Little Daughter." Declined. —"A War Story," T. B. C., Los Angeles.—Declined.

STAGE GOSSIP.

After the rehearsal of "Redemption," at Birmingham, Gounod kissed Sir Michael Costa, aged seventy-two, on one cheek, saying "C'est mon devoir," and kissed Marie Roze, aged—say over sixteen, on both cheeks, with the words, "C'est mon recompense." Mrs. Weldon, his ancient persecutrix, was not at the rehearsal, fortunately for the peace of the town.

The libretto of "Aida" was written by Mariette Pasha, the distinguished Egyptologist, and given by him to Felicien David, who did not dare to attempt the music in the time required; then it was given to Verdi, who accepted the thirty thousand dollars offered at once, and was at work on the first act the morning after the libretto reached him. If composers do live by their achievements, Verdi will live by "Aida," but Mariette should not be forgotten.

Christine Nilsson says that she will remain in America and open the new New York Opera House in 1883. No one would be more acceptable. There was a very slight row between Madame Nilsson and Madame Patti a few weeks ago. Patti had a suite of rooms with Signor Nicolini on the first floor of the Windsor Hotel when Nilsson arrived. The Swedish nightingale was given rooms on the second floor above Patti's, but she refused indignantly to accept them, and drove down to the Victoria Hotel in high dudgeon. She considered it a pronounced slight to be offered rooms higher up in the building than those occupied by Patti, although Nilsson's rooms were the more attractive. Now the two great singers bow coldly when they meet.

"The assault on Miss Maude Harrison, the actress, by Mr. J. H. Stoddard, the actor, has been one of the theatrical topics of the week," remarks a writer in the Brooklyn Eagle. "Mr. Stoddard personally possesses some of the nervous quickness which characterizes his acting, but in private life has always borne a good reputation for politeness and sobriety. Miss Harrison, formerly a Brooklyn girl, has red hair and natural activity, but those who know her say that she is uniformly ladylike, and altogether unlikely to willfully provoke enmity. Both have been members of the Union Square Theatre Company for years, and their professional intercourse was not known to have ever been unpleasant. I happened to be in a room with them last Monday night. The outbreak began when Mr. Stoddard ordered Miss Harrison to do something that was against her will. She refused, and began to weep. He insisted, and used ungentlemanly language. Then she defied him, and he caught her by the shoulders, forced her down to her knees, gripped the back of her neck, shook her much as a terrier does a rat, and finally threw her, with brutal violence, flat on her face."

While Mr. Joseph Jefferson was once playing Rip Van Winkle at Chicago, he went to the theatre very much exhausted by a long day's fishing on the lake. When the curtain rose on the third act, it disclosed the white-haired Rip still deep in his twenty-years' nap. Five, ten, twenty minutes passed, and he did not waken. The audience began to get impatient, and the prompter uneasy. The great actor doubtless knew what he was about, but this was carrying the "realistic" business too far. The fact was that all the time Jefferson was really sleeping the sleep of the just, or rather of the fisherman who had sat eight hours in the sun without getting a single bite. Finally the gallery became uproarious, and at this point Jefferson began to snore. This decided the prompter, who opened a small trap beneath the stage and began to prod Rip from below. The much-traveled comedian began to fumble in his pocket for an imaginary ticket, and muttered drowsily: "Going right through, 'ductor." The audience was transfixed with amazement at this entirely new reading, when Jefferson sat up with a loud shriek, and evidently in agony. The exasperated prompter had "jabbed" him with a pin. The play went on then—with a rush.

The theatrical world of Paris is literally up in arms against Monsieur Octave Mirbeau, of the Figaro. This young and brilliant journalist, apropos of the Coquelin-Mayer law suit, wrote an article in which he deprecated the attention paid to the private life of actors, and censured the public that greedily sought for such details. The actor, he continued, was only an instrument, a violin, that gives out sounds according to the impulse given it, and which deserves therefore, in itself, little or no recognition. In sober fact, the artist is elevated in exact proportion as art declines. Terrible was the wrath of all the foyers. The Association of Dramatic Artists held a solemn meeting at the apartment of Halanzier, and a committee of four waited on the editor of the Figaro. He laid the blame on the young feuilletonist. The feuilletonist in reply proved by documentary evidence that Magnard, the editor of the Figaro, suggested and inspired the articles. Monsieur Mirbeau has his hands full. Monsieur Damala has sent a challenge to him, and Sarah Bernhardt is anxious to see her son follow her husband's example. D'Aubray, of the Palais Royal, has demanded reparation, and Raymond threatens to thrash him. Got and Lasalle are also on the war-path. Mirbeau, on his part, has challenged Magnard for disavowing his article. Altogether it is a very pretty quarrel as it stands.

Miss Carlyon, the actress, is Mrs. Melville in private life. She has been a member of the company supporting John A. Stevens in "Passion's Slave." In St. Louis she threw up her engagement, and one of the reasons which she gave to a Post-Dispatch reporter was that she did not like the star's manner of kissing in the play. "You see," she said, "Mr. Stevens always used the 'Henry V.' kiss, and I was decidedly unpleasant, as he was neither a husband, a relation, nor a lover." The audience was sure to titter, too, and she thought this was due to the actor's awkwardness. "This kiss," she kindly added, for public information, "is the one that Rignold uses in the play of 'Henry V.' The gentleman comes behind the lady, and puts both his hands over her shoulders on her cheeks, so that the fingers meet just beneath her chin. Then he pulls her head back to his shoulder, and kisses her tully on the lips, keeping his mouth to hers. After he kissed me that way once, I always moved my mouth, so that he kissed me on the chin, and not on the lips, but it was unpleasant in the extreme. I am not at all prudish, but I am an artist, and I do not want to use stage business that has descended to the low variety theatres. It is stage etiquette that no gentleman should kiss a lady on the lips. Mr. Stevens has violated this rule over and over again."

CCLXI.—Bill of Fare for Six Persons—Sunday, December 31.

Bean Soup.
Lobster en t oquille.
Boiled Tongue, Mayonnaise Dressing.
Corn Fritters. Spinach.
Broiled Teal Ducks. Baked Potatoes.
Celery Salad.
German Puffs.
Apples, Pears, Japanese Persimmons, Bananas, Oranges, and Grapes.

GERMAN PUFFS.—The yolks of six eggs beaten light, added to one pint of milk; pour part of this mixture on the flour; beat light and smooth, then add the remainder of the milk and eggs, half a teaspoonful of salt, a tablespoonful of melted butter. Butter muffin-cups and half fill them with the batter. This quantity will make twelve puffs. Bake twenty minutes in a quick oven; serve in a hot platter with sauce poured over them. SAUCE.—The whites of six eggs beaten to a stiff froth, add one cupful of sugar beaten in gradually, and then put in the juice of one lemon or two oranges.

"Where is the old steward?" inquired a traveler as he stepped aboard an outgoing steamer, just previous to his departure. "Oh, he was discharged some time ago," replied the captain. "Why, he seemed to be a first-class fellow," rejoined the first speaker; "why was he kicked out?" "Well, to tell you the truth, he got too big for his breeches, and we bounced him," emphatically ejaculated the captain. This conversation occurred within hearing of a bright-eyed, intelligent little girl, the daughter of one of the tourists on the steamer. Subsequently another passenger arrived, and, after bestowing a casual glance around, said: "I don't see the old steward; what has become of him?" "I think he was discharged," volunteered a bystander. "Do you know what for?" "No, sir," "I do," piped a small voice from the cabin door. Looking around, the inquirer saw the smiling face of a little girl peeping out at him. "Well, my dear," said he, "why was the steward discharged?" "Oh, I don't like to tell," she bashfully replied. "But I want to know," he persisted; "come tell me, that's a good girl. What did they discharge him for?" "Cause," she slowly answered, "cause his pants were too short."

Miss Calhoun appeared recently at the Imperial Theatre, London, in "As You Like It." Her representation does not call for any modification of a previous brief criticism, says the New York Times correspondent. She is a novice with great intelligence; has a charming appearance; is young, and should, in the course of time, make a considerable position in profession upon which she has entered. One of the critics in a popular Sunday journal advises her to remove from her announcements the words, "The great American actress," and other tricky devices. She will be wise if she acts upon this hint. I am informed that Miss Calhoun is well known in California. It is erroneously stated that she is Mr. Vezin's pupil. She has had the advantage of tuition at the hands of Mr. Ryder, who is the author of more Ophelias, Juliets, and Rosalinds than any other dramatic preceptor. Should Miss Calhoun remain in England, she will have no difficulty in obtaining a satisfactory engagement at one of the West End theatres. There never was a time when the stage offered so lucrative an opening for dramatic talent.

"A train boy," says Bill Nye, describing a Colorado trip, "told me that a tourist from Philadelphia once tried to wipe his nose on the Alpine tunnel while the train was in motion, and when they got through into daylight, and his companions told him to take in his head, he couldn't do it—because it was half a mile behind examining the formation of the tunnel. Later, it was found that the man was dead. The passengers said that they noticed a kind of crunching noise while going through the tunnel that sounded like the smashing of false teeth, but they paid no attention to it."

Marriage is becoming common among Paris actresses. A recent instance is that of Mademoiselle Duvergier, famous for playing the rôles of milkmaids, shepherdesses, and ragged beggars, with diamonds flashing all over her, and for her association with old Prince Demidoff. She is made the wife of an actor named Delacour, who used to play Armand to her Camille.

A bullet invented by a German chemist is made of a powerful anesthetic, which breaks on striking a person, who is made unconscious for twelve hours, and while in that condition can be taken prisoner. The inventor puts forward his device in all honesty.

The Mayor of Deadwood has been fined for not obeying when the foreman of a fire company, to which his honor belongs, commanded him to assist in reeling horse.

—THE LIVERMORE STYLOGRAPHIC PEN COMPANY have recently cut down the price of their short plain pens to $2, and short gold-mounted to $2.50 each. You can buy them for that money by remitting the amount to LOUIS E. DUNLAP, Manager Stylographic Pen Company, 290 Washington Street, Boston; the pen, together with a package of superior ink, will be sent by return mail, and the money will be at once refunded if they do not prove to be perfect and satisfactory in every respect. The Stylographic Pen Company, who manufacture the Livermore Pen, is the large concern of the kind in the world, with branches at New York, Chicago, and London, Eng.

—THE SAN FRANCISCO PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY makes the following announcement: "Owing to the extraordinary and unexpected fact that all places of amusement in this city are open at present, we are compelled to give our next Philharmonic Concert on Friday, January 5, 1883, in the afternoon instead of the evening. This change is made on account of the engagement of all good musicians at the various theatres, etc., thereby making it absolutely impossible to obtain them for the evening. On this occasion we will present, among other numbers, the greatest novelties of modern orchestral music for the first time in this city, viz.: Richard Wagner's 'Vorpiel to Parsifal,' and 'Walküren Ritt,' from 'Nibelungen.' Also, for the first time in twelve years, Beethoven's Symphony in E flat, 'Eroica,' by an enlarged orchestra of sixty musicians, conducted by Mr. Gustav Hinrichs. Box sheet open at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s music store, on Wednesday, January 3, 1883."

JNO. LEVY & CO.

118 SUTTER STREET,

Makers and Importers of Fine

JEWELRY,

Have made extensive preparations for the HOLIDAY TRADE, and have added a most exquisite and odd line of NOVELTIES to their already ELEGANT STOCK OF DIAMONDS, PRECIOUS STONES, WATCHES, SILVERWARE, CARRIAGE and MANTEL CLOCKS, OPERA GLASSES, FANS, etc., together making the handsomest display of goods ever exhibited in this city. We cordially invite an inspection of our stock, it being no trouble to show goods. Everything marked in plain figures and strictly one price.

WE SELL AT CLOSER PRICES THAN ANY HOUSE IN OUR LINE.

OPEN EVENINGS.

COLMAN BROS.

Stylish and Serviceable CLOTHING at Lowest Prices. In every department our goods are marked for sale at the merest advance over manufacturing cost. The pinnacle of success attained in our Men's, Boys', and Children's Departments. Our original styles at popular low prices, compelling buyers to patronize us. Satisfaction guaranteed. Established 1853.

LEADING CLOTHIERS,

SOUTHWEST CORNER MONTGOMERY AND BUSH STREETS.

N. B.—A large variety of Dressing Gowns and Smoking Jackets just received direct from Europe.

KNABE PIANOS

"I have never seen their equal."—Clara Louise Kellogg.

A. L. Baueroff & Co., 121 Market St., S. F., Sole Agents.

There is a desperate split, says the Texas Siftings, in the Austin Blue-Light Colored Tabernacle. A visiting clergyman, who is chaplain to a colored militia company, and much given to using military phrases, preached a very eloquent sermon, in which he continually repeated the words: "I tell you, brethren and sisters, hold fast to yer colors." About a dozen very dark "sisters" left the sacred building, leading out their light saddle-colored children. One of them, who was as black as the ace of spades, was heard to remark: "Hit's pretty late in de day for dat pasture to be preaching dat ar strange doctrine to an Austin cullud congregation."

Two harnessed crocodiles tamely drew a wagon into Atlanta.

—WANTED—A POSITION AS GOVERNESS BY A young lady just arrived from the East. English branches, German, and music. Best of city references. Address Governess, this office.

—CHAS. GOFFRIE, SOLO VIOLINIST, FROM LONDON, has a rare collection of genuine Cremona Violins and fine Bows, at his residence, 807 Bush Street; can be seen from 8:30 to 11 A. M. N. B.—Violins bought from Mr. Goffrie will be taken back and money refunded, minus 10 per cent., at any time.

—"ROUGH ON RATS." CLEARS OUT RATS, MICE, flies, roaches, bed-bugs, ants, vermin, chipmunks, etc.

—PERSONS WHOSE BLOOD HAS BEEN CORRUPTED and the circulation deranged by foul secretions—the result of the disordered chemistry of the body—need for their purification something like an inward baptism at the hands of Mrs. Lydia E. Pinkham, whose laboratory is at No. 233 Western Avenue, Lynn, Mass. Her Vegetable Compound is fairly inundating the country as with a river of life.

—IT IS TO BE HOPED THAT THE POISONOUS Ague medicines have had their day. Arsenic and quinine are not desirable commodities to carry about in one's system, even for the sake of temporarily displacing the malarial poison which produces Fever and Ague. Ayer's Ague Cure is a sure antidote for the Ague, and is perfectly harmless, leaving the system in as good condition as before the Ague was contracted.

—REVITALIZING THE BLOOD IS ABSOLUTELY necessary for the cure of general debility, weakness, lassitude, etc. The best enricher of the blood is Brown's Iron Bitters.

—CHAS. E. FAIRBANK, PACIFIC COAST Traffic Agent of the Chicago, Milwaukee, and St. Paul Railway, who is now in Oregon, attending to the interests of that company, returns by the steamship Oregon. Mr. Fairbank has sole charge of their business in this city and the Pacific Coast at large.

—REDDING'S RUSSIA SALVE IS UNEQUALLED FOR chilblains, chapped hands, frost bites, etc. Try it.

—USE SOUTH PRAIRIE COAL.

—LADY READERS OF THE ARGONAUT WILL remember that the place to buy colognes, perfumery, toilet soaps, brushes, sponges, cosmetics, etc., is at the elegant and well-stocked store of James G. Steele & Co., Chemists and Apothecaries, 635 Market Street, Palace Hotel, San Francisco.

—"MOTHER SWAN'S WORM SYRUP" FOR FEVERISHNESS, restlessness, worms, constipation. 25c.

—HEADQUARTERS FOR ELECTRIC BELTS, AND appliances for the cure of nervous, painful, and debilitating diseases. Pamphlets, with full particulars, free. Address PULVERMACHER GALVANIC COMPANY, 513 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Cal.

—Dr. E. O. COCHRANE, DENTIST, 850 MARKET cor. Stockton (over drug store.) Office hours, 9 to 5.

Go to Bradley & Rutson's New Photographic Gallery southeast corner Geary and Dupont streets

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

FOURTH CONCERT

...AT...

PLATT'S HALL,

...ON...

Friday AFTERNOON, January 5th,

At 3 o'clock.

ENLARGED ORCHESTRA OF 60 MUSICIANS.

G. HINRICHS, CONDUCTOR.

The Programme includes Beethoven's "EROICA" Symphony, and for the first time in this city Wagner's "PAR-SIFAL," Vorspiel, and WALKÜREN RIT.

Grand Rehearsal Jan. 4th, at 10.30.
Box Sheet at Sherman, Clay & Co's.
HENRY HEYMAN, Secretary.

NEW YEAR'S CARDS.

The largest and finest line in the city, wholesale and retail.

Specialty made of Cards exclusively.

J. J. EVANS, STATIONER,

436 California Street.

OPEN EVENINGS.

FINE STATIONERY
DOXEY'S

We have just received a fine stock of English and American Writing Papers, Plain and Illustrated Papeteries, Billets de Correspondence.

MEN AND PLACE CARDS, and other Artistic Stationery.

MONOGRAMS AND CRESTS, designed, engraved, and stamped.

VISITING CARDS engraved and printed.

"A MODERN INSTANCE."

By W. D. HOWELLS, can now be had at

DOXEY & CO.'S, 23 DUPONT ST.

Specially for Stout Figures, (worn with or without Straps, by mail, $3.00. Send waist, hip, and bust measure. Also, Shoulder Braces, Union Under Flannels, Ladies' and Children's Comfort Waists, Bustles, Hose Supporters, etc. Send for Circular. The only Depot for these goods.

MRS. N. H. OBER & CO.
Boston Dress Reform,
336 Sutter Street,
SAN FRANCISCO.

An Elegant Corset to Order for $4.

THE AMERICAN SUGAR REFINERY
SAN FRANCISCO,
MANUFACTURERS OF ALL

Classes of Refined Sugars, including Loaf Sugar for export.

C. ADOLPHE LOW, President.
Office—208 California Street.

J. M. LITCHFIELD & CO.

MERCHANT TAILORS,

And Dealers in Gents' Furnishing Goods,
415 MONTGOMERY STREET,

Ret. California and Sacramento San Francisco

GEORGE MORROW & CO.

(Established 1854.)

HAY, GRAIN, AND
COMMISSION MERCHANTS

SHIPPING ORDERS A SPECIALTY.
39 Clay Street, San Francisco, Cal.

Telephone No. 35.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—THE GERman Savings and Loan Society. For the half year ending Dec. 31, 1882, the Board of Directors of the GERMAN SAVINGS AND LOAN SOCIETY has declared a dividend on Term Deposits at the rate of 4 3/4 per cent per annum, and on Ordinary Deposits at the rate of 3 1/2 per cent per annum, free from Federal Taxes, and payable on and after the 2d day of January, 1883. By order. GEORGE LETTE, Secretary.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—SAN FRAN-

CISCO SAVINGS UNION, 532 California Street, corner Webb. For the half year ending with 31st December, 1882, a dividend has been declared at the rate of four and thirty-two one-hundredths (4 32-100 %) per cent per annum on Term Deposits, and three and sixty one-hundredths (3 60-100 %) per cent per annum on Ordinary Deposits, free of Federal Tax, payable on and after Wednesday, 17th January, 1883. LOVELL WHITE, Cashier.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—THE CALI-

FORNIA SAVINGS AND LOAN SOCIETY, Northwest corner Powell and Eddy Streets. For the half year ending December 31, 1882, the Board of Directors of the California Savings and Loan Society has declared a dividend on term deposits at the rate of four and thirty-two one-hundredths (4 32-100 %) per cent per annum and on ordinary deposits at the rate of three and six-tenths (3 6-10) per cent per annum, free from Federal Tax, and payable on and after January 2, 1883. By order. VERNON CAMPBELL, Secretary.

OPHIR SILVER MINING COMPANY

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 27th day of December, 1882, an assessment (No. 43) of One (51) Dollar per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 14, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California. Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on Wednesday, the 31st day of January, 1883, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before, will be sold on Tuesday, the 20th day of February, 1883, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with the costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors. C. L. MCCOY, Secretary.

Office—Room 16, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

NEW YEAR CARDS

AND FINE STATIONERY
AT DODGE, BROS. & SHREVE, 32 GOLD STREET.

THE TUNEFUL LIAR.

Old Sayings.

As blunt as a beetle,
As sharp as a lance,
As grave as a preaching,
As gay as a dance,
As late as the gloamin',
As like as two peas,
As crook'd as a ram's horn,
As round as a cheese,
As flat as a flounder,
As sticky as gum,
As wide as a common,
As tight as a drum,
As white as a miller,
As black as a crow,
As lean as a grayhound,
As bent as a bow,
As frail as a bandbox,
As stout as an oak,
As queer as a Quaker,
As game as a cock,
As cute as a lawyer,
As square as a die,
As keen as a razor,
As warm as a pie,
As drunk as a piper,
As sober as a judge,
As clean as a shaving,
As filthy as smudge,
As swift as an arrow,
As slow as a snail,
As blithe as a linnet,
As right as the mail.

The Broker Who Did It.

Labouchère and Langtry parted,
All for darling Freddie Gebhardt!
Labouchère is broken-hearted,
And she'd have the Langtry peppered!
O that I were Freddie Gebhardt,
Just as rich and strong as he is!
I would be a bounding leopard,
Just like pretty Freddie Gebhardt, Langtry's pet, and sweet as she is!
—Louisville Courier-Journal.

The Spanish Conquests of Hannibal.

Now from Madrid into Cadiz Sound of woe and wailing made is
By the coal-eyed Spanish ladies.
Down their cheeks the tears are rainin',
And the sad guitar's complainin',
Tells that wanders, piny Maine in,
Hannibal Hamlin.

"Castanets so sweetly rang, O,
As we danced the mad fandango.
Artfully we made each fan go;
Pierced with darts from full-orbed eyes you,
Did not fail to paralyze you,
Teased you—but we love and prize you,
Hannibal Hamlin.

"Pack your bag and put your coat on,
Passage take the next steamboat on,
Cross the wide Atlantic Croton,
Hear and heed the prayerful chorus
Of your olive-cheeked adorners,
Señoritas and Señoras,
Hannibal Hamlin!"
—New York Sun.

Three Daughters.

Three daughters went sailing out into the street,
Arrayed in cheap finery, gaudy and gay;
Their frizzes and bangs were too awfully sweet,
And they ogled the gentlemen all of the day.
For girls will flirt who have nothing to do,
And tarnish their names with follies not few,
And afterward ever be groaning.

Three mothers all tired were working away,
And cooking, and sweeping, and sewing so fast,
And wishing their daughters to help them would stay,
And anxiously scanning the faces that passed.
For mothers must toil till faces are white,
Who bring up the girls to be frivolous quite,
And afterward ever be groaning.

Three fathers, all hurrying homeward to rest,
Distracted with business worries and strife,
Met three silly daughters, all gaudily dressed,
Inviting those dangers that ruin a life.
For fathers have cause to be always afraid
Who bring up their girls without learning a trade,
And afterward ever be groaning.
—Burlington Hawkeye.

Christmas Stockings.

"The stockings were hung by the chimney with care,"
That's grandmamma's black one, all wrinkled and spare,
And Aunt Anna's blue one, from Boston, as lean
As if 'twere a pole for her favorite bean;
That long one of cotton, so white, is mamma's;
That short, clumsy, darned one, of course, is papa's;
That one, all embroidered, of silk is Miss Kate's—
How graceful and fragile it looks by its mates;
Its foot is so tiny, its ankle so neat,
The print of its garter yet clings to it sweet.
The little, red, plump one is Willie's, we know,
Because it has one little hole in its toe;
That woolen one, shapely and big as a bag,
Is Ellen's; the cork; of its size she may brag.
And there are the baby's wee socks on a chair,
So fleecy and soft. Santa Claus may despair
To fill them with anything nearly so sweet
As the dear little fellow's own pink, dimpled feet.
Oh, are these stockings a poem divine
In being, like poetry, "feet" on a "line?"
—H. C. Dodge.

Her Parlor.

The way into her parlor is "up a winding stair;"
Gay Japanese umbrellas are fastened here and there,
And fans and peacock feathers hang with a careless air.
The door is low and curtained. I enter. Overhead
Glistens a gilded cobweb; with reverence I tread
On the Turkish prayer-rug in blue, old gold, and red,
Set with dishes, fashioned in years ago;
On the mantel, and by the fire's glow
Those crimson poppies are nodding in a row.
The parlor with happy thoughts of spring;
On the ceiling I hope no one will —Boston Transcript.

The Secret

of the universal success of Brown's Iron Bitters is simply this: It is the best Iron preparation ever made; is compounded on thoroughly scientific, chemical and medicinal principles, and does just what is claimed for it—no more and no less.

By thorough and rapid assimilation with the blood, it reaches every part of the system, healing, purifying and strengthening. Commencing at the foundation it builds up and restores lost health—in no other way can lasting benefit be obtained.

75 Dearborn Ave., Chicago, Nov. 7.

I have been a great sufferer from a very weak stomach, heartburn, and dyspepsia in its worst form. Nearly everything I ate gave me distress, and I could eat but little. I have tried everything recommended, have taken the prescriptions of a dozen physicians, but got no relief until I took Brown's Iron Bitters. I feel none of the old troubles, and am a new man. I am getting much stronger, and feel first-rate. I am a railroad engineer, and now make my trips regularly. I can not say too much in praise of your wonderful medicine.
D. C. Mack.

BROWN'S IRON BITTERS does not contain whiskey or alcohol, and will not blacken the teeth, or cause headache and constipation. It will cure dyspepsia, indigestion, heartburn, sleeplessness, dizziness, nervous debility, weakness, &c.

Use only Brown's Iron Bitters made by Brown Chemical Co., Baltimore. Crossed red lines and trade-mark on wrapper.

A NOTED BUT UNTITLED WOMAN.

(From the Boston Globe.)

Measra, Editors—

The above is a good likeness of Mrs. Lydia E. Pinkham, of Lynn, Mass., who above all other human beings may be truthfully called the "Dear Friend of Woman," as some of her correspondents love to call her. She is zealously devoted to her work, which is the outcome of a life-study, and is obliged to keep six lady assistants, to help her answer the large correspondence which daily pours in upon her, each bearing its special burden of suffering, or joy at release from it. Her Vegetable Compound is a medicine for good and not evil purposes. I have personally investigated it and am satisfied of the truth of this.

On account of its proven merits, it is recommended and prescribed by the best physicians in the country. One says: "It works like a charm and saves much pain. It will cure the worst form of female diseases."

It permeates every portion of the system, and gives new life and vigor. It removes faintness, flatulency, destroys all craving for stimulants, and relieves weakness of the stomach. It cures Bloating, Headaches, Nervous Prostration, General Debility, Sleeplessness, Depression and Indigestion. That feeling of bearing down, causing pain, weight and backache, is always permanently cured by its use. It will at all times, and under all circumstances, act in harmony with the law that governs the female system.

It costs only $1 per bottle or six for $5, and is sold by druggists. Any advice required as to special cases, and the names of many who have been restored to perfect health by the use of the Vegetable Compound, can be obtained by addressing Mrs. P., with stamp for reply, at her home in Lynn, Mass.

For Kidney Complaint of either sex this compound is unsurpassed as abundant testimonials show. "Mrs. Pinkham's Liver Pills," says one writer, "are the best in the world for the cure of Constipation, Biliousness and Torpidity of the liver. Her Blood Purifier works wonders in its special line and bids fair to equal the Compound in its popularity. All must respect her as an Angel of Mercy whose sole ambition is to do good to others."
Philadelphia, Pa. (2) Mrs. A. M. D.

ONE MILLION COPIES SOLD!

Everybody Wants It!

Everybody Needs It!

THE SCIENCE OF LIFE, OR SELF-PRESERVATION.

Exhausted Vitality, Nervous and Physical Debility, Premature Decline in Man, or Vitality impaired by too close application to business, may be restored, and manhood re-earned.

Two hundred and fifty-eighth edition, revised and enlarged, just published. It is a standard medical work, the best in the English language, written by a physician of great experience, to whom was awarded a gold and jeweled medal by the National Medical Association. It contains beautiful and very expensive engravings, 300 pages, more than 125 valuable prescriptions for all forms of diseases, acute and chronic, the result of many years of extensive and successful practice, any one of which is worth ten times the price of the book. Bound in beautiful French cloth, embossed, full gilt. Price, only $1.25, by mail, securely sealed, postpaid, on receipt of price. Illustrated sample, 6 cents. Send now.

THE SCIENCE OF LIFE, OR SELF-PRESERVATION.

Is beyond all comparison the most extraordinary work on Physiology ever published. There is nothing whatever that the married or single can either require or wish to know but what is fully explained.—London Lancet.

THE SCIENCE OF LIFE, OR SELF-PRESERVATION.

Is a marvel of art and beauty, warranted to be a better medical book in every sense than can be obtained elsewhere for double the price, or the money will be refunded in every instance.—Author

N. B.—YOUNG and MIDDLE-AGED MEN can save much time, suffering, and expense by reading the Science of Life, or conferring with the author, who may be consulted on all diseases requiring skill and experience. Address

PEABODY MEDICAL INSTITUTE,

Or W. H. PARKER, M. D.,

4 Bulfinch Street, Boston, Mass.

AYER'S CATHARTIC PILLS,

For all the Purposes of a Family Physic,

CURING

Costiveness, Indigestion, Jaundice, Dysentery, Dyspepsia, Foul Stomach and Breath, Headache, Erysipelas, Piles, Rheumatism, Eruptions and Skin Diseases, Biliousness, Liver Complaint, Dropsy, Tetter, Tumors and Salt Rheum, Worms, Gout, Neuralgia, as a Dinner

Pill, and Purifying the Blood, are the most congenial purgative yet perfected. Their effects abundantly show how much they excel all other pills. They are safe and pleasant to take, but powerful to cure. They purge out the foul humors of the blood; they stimulate the sluggish or disordered organs into action, and they impart health and tone to the whole being. They cure not only the every day complaints of everybody, but formidable and dangerous diseases. Most skillful physicians, most eminent surgeons, and our best citizens, send certificates of cures performed, and of great benefits derived from these Pills. They are the safest and best physic for children, because mild as well as effectual. Being sugar-coated, they are easy to take, and being purely vegetable, they are entirely harmless.

PREPARED BY

DR. J. C. AYER & Co., Lowell, Mass.

PRACTICAL AND ANALYTICAL CHEMISTS.

Sold by all Druggists and Dealers in Medicines.

COMPOUND OXYGEN

NEW TREATMENT BY INHALATION, for Consumption, Asthma, Bronchitis, Dyspepsia, Catarrh, Headache, Debility, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, and all Chronic and Nervous Disorders. Prepared by DR. STARKIE & P. E. E. PHARMACEUTICAL CO., Pa. Package contains all directions, and is easily sent by express, ready for USE AT HOME. H. E. MATTHEWS, Forwarding Agent, 806 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Cal. Send for Free Pamphlets.

CONSUMPTION.

I have a positive remedy for the above disease; by its use thousands of cases of the worst kind of long standing have been cured. Indeed, so strong is my faith in its efficacy, that I will send TWO BOTTLES FREE, together with a VALUABLE TREATISE on this disease, to any sufferer. Give Express & P. O. address, DR. T. A. SLOCUM, 1st Pearl St., N. Y.

CHARLES R. ALLEN

Wholesale and Retail Dealer in COAL or Office by Telephone 308. Agent Pittsburg Coal Mining Company.

118 and 120 Beale Street, S. F.

SAMUEL P. MIDDLETON, AUCTIONEER.

JOHN MIDDLETON & SON,

Stock, Real Estate, and General

AUCTIONEERS.

116 Montgomery Street,

Occidental Hotel Block SAN FRANCISCO.

THUNDER POWDER COMPANY.

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California; location of works, Alameda County, California. NOTICE.—There are delinquent upon the following described stock, on account of assessment (No. 1) levied on the fifteenth day of August, 1882, the several amounts set opposite the names of the respective shareholders, as follows:

Name	Cert. No.	No. Shares	Amount
Charles DeLacy, Trustee	3	5	$2 00
Charles DeLacy, Trustee	37	10,000	4,000 00
Charles DeLacy, Trustee	73	200	80 00
Charles DeLacy, Trustee	74	300	120 00
Charles DeLacy, Trustee	79	14,995	5,998 00
Charles DeLacy, Trustee	87	6,000	2,400 00
F. M. Pixley, Trustee	4	5	not issued 2 00
F. M. Pixley, Trustee	5	995	398 00
W. W. Dodge, Trustee	6	5	2 00
W. W. Dodge, Trustee	7	995	398 00
E. G. Waite, Trustee	8	5	2 00
E. G. Waite, Trustee	9	2,495	998 00
Geo. W. Prescott, Trustee	10	5	2 00
Geo. W. Prescott, Trustee	11	995	398 00
Wm. Sherman, Trustee	12	5	2 00
Wm. Sherman, Trustee	13	2,495	998 00
R. M. Anthony, Trustee	14	1,000	400 00
John A. Benson, Trustee	15	2,000	800 00
Theodore Wagner, Trustee	16	1,000	400 00
M. Balbridge, Trustee	17	1,500	not issued 600 00
Fred' L. Lux, Trustee	18	1,000	400 00
Charles Camden, Trustee	19	1,000	400 00
Jackson Hart, Trustee	20	1,000	400 00
R. D. Lennox, Trustee	21	500	200 00
Daniel Gorham, Trustee	23	500	200 00
Theodore Greene, Trustee	24	1,000	400 00
Eugene L. Sullivan, Trustee	25	2,000	800 00
Wm. E. Barnes, Trustee	26	500	200 00
J. H. Fish, Trustee	27	500	200 00
T. E. Frasier, Trustee	28	1,000	400 00
T. E. Frasier, Trustee	29	1,000	400 00
T. E. Frasier, Trustee	30	1,000	400 00
T. E. Frasier, Trustee	31	1,000	400 00
Chas. S. Neal, Trustee	32	5	2 00
Wm. E. Barnes, Trustee	33	5	2 00
Chas. H. Hopkins, Trustee	34	5	2 00
Wm. Wilson, Trustee	35	5	2 00
Benj. Teal, Trustee	36	5	2 00
F. C. Kiel, Trustee	37	1,000	400 00
F. C. Kiel, Trustee	38	1,000	400 00
Wm. Heick, Trustee	39	1,000	400 00
Wm. Heick, Trustee	40	1,000	400 00
F. M. Pixley, Trustee	41	1,000	not issued 400 00
John F. Baxter, Trustee	42	3,000	1,200 00
David S. Sherman, Trustee	43	3,000	1,200 00
W. H. Campbell, Trustee	44	1,000	400 00
R. N. Bourne, Trustee	45	500	200 00
Geo. E. Barnes, Trustee	46	500	200 00
Wm. Wilson, Trustee	47	100	40 00
L. E. Crane, Trustee	48	50	20 00
S. B. Herriman, Trustee	49	50	20 00
A. P. Bauton, Trustee	50	50	20 00
W. W. Glazier, Trustee	51	50	not issued 20 00
H. W. Newbauer, Trustee	52	250	100 00
L. H. Ten, Trustee	53	250	100 00
Theodore Wagner, Trustee	54	1,000	400 00
Matthew Clark, Trustee	55	500	200 00
Jas. S. Porteous, Trustee	56	500	200 00
Thos. Legg, Trustee	57	100	40 00

And in accordance with law, and an order of the Board of Directors made on the fifteenth day of August, 1882, so many shares of each parcel of such stock as may be necessary will be sold at public auction at the company's office, No. 606 Montgomery Street, Room 5, San Francisco, California, on Monday, the ninth day of October, 1882, at the hour of one o'clock P. M. of said day, to pay said delinquent assessment thereon, together with costs of advertising and expenses of the sale. C. M. OAKLEY, Secretary. Office—Room 5, Sherman Building, No. 606 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

POSTPONEMENT.—The sale day of the above delinquent stock is hereby postponed until the sixteenth (16th) day of October, 1882, at the same place and hour. By order of the Board of Directors. C. M. OAKLEY, Secretary.

POSTPONEMENT.—The sale day of the above delinquent stock is hereby postponed until the thirtieth (30th) day of October, 1882, at the same place and hour. By order of the Board of Directors. C. M. OAKLEY, Secretary.

POSTPONEMENT.—The sale day of the above delinquent stock is hereby postponed until the sixth (6th) day of November, 1882, at the same place and hour. By order of the Board of Directors. C. M. OAKLEY, Secretary.

POSTPONEMENT.—The sale day of the above delinquent stock is hereby postponed until the thirteenth (13th) day of November, 1882, at the same place and hour. By order of the Board of Directors. C. M. OAKLEY, Secretary.

POSTPONEMENT.—The sale day of the above delinquent stock is hereby postponed until the twentieth (20th) day of November, 1882, at the same place and hour. By order of the Board of Directors. C. M. OAKLEY, Secretary.

POSTPONEMENT.—The sale day of the above delinquent stock is hereby postponed until the twenty-seventh (27th) day of November, 1882, at the same place and hour. By order of the Board of Directors. C. M. OAKLEY, Secretary.

POSTPONEMENT.—The sale day of the above delinquent stock is hereby postponed until the eleventh (11th) day of December, 1882, at the same place and hour. By order of the Board of Directors. C. M. OAKLEY, Secretary.

POSTPONEMENT.—The sale day of the above delinquent stock is hereby postponed until the second (2d) day of January, 1883, at the same place and hour. By order of the Board of Directors. C. M. OAKLEY, Secretary.

SIERRA NEVADA SILVER MINING

Company. Location of principal place of business San Francisco, California—Location of works, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Trustees, held on the 8th day of December, 1882, an assessment (No. 75) of One Dollar per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, 309 Montgomery Street, Room 37, Nevada Block, San Francisco, California; this assessment shall remain unpaid on the eleventh day of January, 1883, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction, and, unless payment is made before, will be sold on Tuesday, the 30th day of January, 1883, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors. E. L. PARKER, Secretary. Office—Room 37, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

30 DAYS' TRIAL FREE.

We send free on 30 days trial Dr. Dye's Electro-Voltaic Belts and other Electric appliances TO ANY SUFFERING FROM NERVOUS DEBILITY, LOST VITALITY, and Kindred Troubles. Also, for Rheumatism, Liver and Kidney Troubles, and many other diseases. Speedy cures guaranteed. Illustrated pamphlets free. Address VOLTAIC BELT CO., Marshall, Mich.

R. H. McDonald,
President,
San Francisco,
Cal.

PACIFIC BANK
Established
1863.
Capital Stock
$1,000,000.00
Surplus 460,800.70

San Francisco, Cal., July 1, 1882.
We take pleasure in presenting for your consideration the following Thirty-eighth Semi-Annual Statement of the condition of this Bank:

RESOURCES.

Bank Premises.....	$150,000 00
Other Real Estate.....	12,825 35
United States Bonds.....	629,507 60
Land Association Stock.....	15,421 55
Loans and Discounts.....	1,785,000 20
Due from Banks.....	527,279 09
Money on hand.....	632,365 30

LIABILITIES.

Capital paid up.....	$1,000,000 00
Surplus.....	460,800 70
Due Depositors.....	1,953,672 80
Due Banks.....	337,491 09
Dividends unpaid.....	134 50
	$3,752,099 09

This Bank has special facilities for doing all kinds of banking business.

CALIFORNIA SUGAR REFINERY.

OFFICE, 325 Market St.
WORKS, Eighth and Brannan Sts.
C. SPRECKELS, President,
J. D. SPRECKELS, Vice-President,
A. B. SPRECKELS, Secretary.

C. P. SHEFFIELD, N. W. SPAULDING, J. PATTERSON

17 and 19 FREMONT ST., SAN FRANCISCO.

JOHN MIDDLETON,
COAL DEALER,
10 POST STREET,
AND
718 SANSOME STREET.

Coal at Lowest Market Rates.

J. R. COWEN. J. W. PORTER.
COWEN & PORTER,
FUNERAL DIRECTORS,
118 Geary Street, San Francisco.
OPPOSITE STARR-KING CHURCH.

MAGNESO-CALCITE

BOND AND NOTE CASES,
JEWEL CASES,
HOUSEHOLD CHESTS.
ABSOLUTELY FIRE-PROOF.

D. S. BROWN & CO.,
36 California Street.

Will be mailed FREE to all applicants, and to customers of last year without ordering it. It contains about 175 pages, 600 illustrations, prices, accurate descriptions and valuable directions for planting 1500 varieties of Vegetable and Flower Seeds, Plants, Fruit Trees, etc. Invaluable to all, especially to Market Gardeners. Send for it!
C. M. FERRY & CO. DETROIT MICH.

RUPTURE Cured. Greatest Invention of the age. FIERCE & SON 704 Sac St., San Fran. Cal.

NOVELTIES

FOR THE HOLIDAYS.

LOUIS BRAVERMAN & CO.

119 MONTGOMERY STREET,

Invite public attention to the finest and best selected stock of Novelties in WATCHES, DIAMONDS, JEWELRY, SILVERWARE, and FRENCH CLOCKS ever exhibited here. Direct importation in every branch enables us to sell goods at lower prices than any house in the city.

Every description of fine DIAMOND WORK and JEWELRY manufactured to order.

STORE OPEN EVERY EVENING DURING DECEMBER.

THE
CALIFORNIA FURNITURE
MANUFACTURING COMPANY

invite the public to visit their

WAREROOMS, 220 TO 226 BUSH STREET

And inspect their

NEW GOODS

Which constitute

THE FINEST DISPLAY OF FURNITURE

Ever shown on this Coast, and which cannot be excelled for Variety and Beauty upon this Continent.

Bring your Friends along. The Rich can gratify their Tastes; the Poor can supply their Wants.

THE CALA. FURNITURE MFG CO., 220 TO 226 BUSH ST.

HOLIDAY-STYLE HATS

IN A LARGE VARIETY, AND A SPECIAL LINE OF

FINE CHILDREN'S GOODS,

JUST OPENED BY

C. HERRMANN & CO.

(HERRMANN, THE HATTER.)

336 KEARNY STREET, BETWEEN BUSH AND PINE STS.

FOR FINE HOLIDAY WINES,
J. GUNDLACH & CO.
Cor. Market and Second,
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

MUSICAL BOXES.

M. F. PAILLARD & CO., 23 Dupont Street, San Francisco, Manufacturers and Importers. A. E. GUILLERAT, Exclusive Agent. Musical Boxes repaired.

A NEW AND DELICIOUS PREPARATION
FROM CORN, FOR BREAKFAST. IT COOKS
THOROUGHLY IN A FEW MINUTES.

TRY IT.
FOR SALE BY ALL
GROCERS.

J. W. EVANS,
29 Post Street, San Francisco.

"IT IS ALMOST HUMAN."

THE NORTON
DOOR-CHECK AND SPRING.

D. S. BROWN & CO., No. 36 California Street,
Sole Agents for Pacific Coast.

C. ADOLPHE LOW & CO.

Commission Merchants,
SAN FRANCISCO.

OFFICE IN NEW YORK, 42 CEDAR

Street
Liberal advances made on consignments

ALASKA

COMMERCIAL CO.

No. 310 SANSOME STREET,

WHOLESALE DEALER IN FURS.

SHERIFF'S SALE.

THE HIBERNIA SAVINGS AND LOAN SOCIETY, Plaintiff, vs. JAMES T. DOUGINE, et al., Defendant. Superior Court, Department No. 3, (Late 10th Dist. Court), No. 6738. Order of Sale and Decree of Foreclosure.

UNDER AND BY VIRTUE OF AN

Order of Sale and Decree of Foreclosure, issued out of the Superior Court, Department No. 3, of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, on the 12th day of September, A. D. 1882, in the above-entitled action, wherein The Hibernia Savings and Loan Society, the above-named plaintiff, obtained a judgment and decree of foreclosure against James T. Dougine, Mrs. James T. Dougine, his wife, and Mary A. Griswold, defendants, on the 1st day of August, A. D. 1882, which said judgment and decree was, on the 12th day of September, A. D. 1882, recorded in Judgment Book 2, of said Superior Court, at page 174. I am commanded to sell all that certain lot, piece, or parcel of land, situate, lying, and being in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and bound d and described as follows:

Commencing at a point on the easterly line of Webster Street, distant two hundred and four feet northerly from the north-easterly corner of Webster and Washington Streets; then e northerly along the easterly line of Webster Street, twenty-five feet and six inches; thence at right angles easterly eighty feet; thence at right angles southerly twenty-five feet and six inches; and thence at right angles westerly eighty feet to the point of commencement. The same being part of the parcel of land known on the official map of the Western Addition as Block No. 268.

Public notice is hereby given that on Monday, the 12th day of January, A. D. 1883, at 12 o'clock, noon, of that day, in front of the Old City Hall, in the city and county of San Francisco, I will, in obedience to said order of sale and decree of foreclosure, sell the above-described property, or so much thereof as may be necessary to raise sufficient to satisfy said judgment, with interest and costs, etc., to the highest and best bidder for gold coin of the United States. San Francisco, December 23, 1882.

JOHN SEDGWICK, Sheriff.
TOSTIN & TOSTIN, Attorneys for Plaintiff.
December 23, 30; January 6, 13.

ART-PAINTED, PLAIN and GLAZED

TILES

For Decorations.

W. W. MONTAGUE & CO.
110 to 118 Battery Street.

